

U. S. MUST RULE
AIR IN WAR

Coffin Tells Senators Gigantic Flying Navy Plans Under Way

Washington, D. C., June 15.—The United States should concentrate on a great air navy to dominate the air to the same extent that Germany has developed and perfected a powerful underwater navy, declared Howard K. Coffin, chairman of the aircraft production board, before the subcommittee considering the Sheppard-Hubert bill to create a separate department of aeronautics. He said $60,000,000 which Congress has intended to appropriate for aeronautics will not be nearly enough.

In the eight years previous to 1916 the government had ordered for aircraft in this country for something like fifty-nine machines, said Mr. Coffin. "When appropriations were made under last year's bill, twenty-nine orders had been placed by the military services for about 300 or 400 machines. I think we got out of that order about 150 or 175 machines. It is not a question of governmental orders or of dollars and cents; it is a question of material, time and organization.

It is not easy to produce machines in this country in the quantities demanded and of the quality and types necessary under modern conditions of fighting. It is becoming evident that whatever factor aircraft may play in the ultimate decision, it is a certain on the other side can possibly win without the supremacy of the air for a strip of territory from fifty to sixty miles behind the fighting front.

How the German man is a more methodical type, who acts under orders, whereas the man in the air must necessarily act largely upon his own initiative. That is a matter of historical fact, the fighting now is virtually all behind the German lines. The last defense of the allied forces, about which we have been reading for the last few days, was largely dependent upon aircraft at every stage of its move. There were three distinct strata of aircraft in the air—the light one-seater, the fastest fighting machines, 15,000 to 20,000 feet in the air. These machines were protecting the advance aircraft, the one which the light machine guns had been cleaned out by artillery. Beneath these two were bombing machines, flying low enough to use machine guns with deadly effect. I believe the result of this battle has clinched the statements which he have heard in many directions for many months that aircraft must ultimately be a deciding factor in the war.

"This country is a great reservoir for men of the type who make flyers and is a tremendous field for aircraft manufacturing resources. I do not believe that there is any more definite services that we can render than to turn over to this country the insurance to the allied governments supremacy of the air. It will take time to do that. It can be done and the plans are being made to anticipate that we will do this. Training fields are already under construction and several more authorized. The amount of production of machines is well under way. It would seem to us that if America can make her great contribution to this war through the air, the element of the supremacy in the other arm of the service, of which she is also the inventor (submarine being the other arm), she will have done the thing which most necessarily appeals to the American imagination and to the American manufacturers' ability and industrial organization generally. We have producing facilities here to make unlimited numbers of machines, when once started on a definite program. We cannot jump into this thing and produce unlimited quantities within a few months."
