her father and mother, dear as they were, were just plain country people.

Sara had spent an eventful Christmast with Jack's sister, and the memory of their town home, with its simple but attractive furniture, the table loaded with silver and fine cut glass, the meals served in courses, and the perfection of the service, which seemed to be always just right, made her dread Jack's coming to the farm.

Sara's mother had insisted on a normal school education for her daughter, and after she had finished she had gone away to teach. The little girl who used to run around the farm in a sun bonnet and a gingham dress now wore her halr done up in soft braids on her head. She no longer answered to the name of Sallie, and her parents were almost uncomfortable in her presence so often did she compare their manner of living with that of her friends. It was no wonder that the advent of Jack King was not looked upon with great pleasure by any one in the house, Sara herself, included.

But the days passed and Jack cme. Sara met him at the station and they drove through the fragrant country to the old farm. Sara's heart was so filled with the joy of having Jack again that she almost forgather family troubles, but when she turned in the driveway and saw her mother dodge hastily indoors at the sight of them, the old fear and worry came back.

Inside there was a faint smell of delicious food. Freshly baked bread, and flaky pies, and sundry other good things. enthusiastically and continued to praise everything he saw as soon as he saw it. At first Sara thought he was trying to be polite, but Jack was too genuine for that, and she saw he was actually enjoying himself. Supper in the diningroom with the big door open to the porch and the smell of honey-suckle floating in, was a wonderful meal to Jack. Sara had tabooed the kerosene lamps, and had substituted old candelabra that she had unearthed in the attic. The soft candle light flickered on the table that groaned with good things to eat.

Freshly-fried brook trout, crusty rolls, cold sliced ham, a whole chicken, honey and big pitchers of ice cold milk, everything was put on at once in the homely country fashion, but Jack did not seem to mind, thought Sara comfortably, and everything was play to the way worst along the proper seems to mind, thought Sara comfortably, and everything was play the parameter in England, where crutches
