Liliuokalani Compiling Dictionary to Perpetuate the Hawaiian Language

Honolulu, Hawaii, Nov. 10.—When the afternoons are sunny in Honolulu, and when a cool trade wind is blowing up from the ocean, a little woman in black may be seen seated on one of the broad lanais—verandas—of Washington Place, in busy Berea street.

This is Lydia Liliuokalani, last of the long line of monarchs that once ruled the Hawaiian Islands. Perhaps, as the years go by, and Liliuokalani looks forward into the future and sees the wonderful possibilities for advancements in trade, industry and education, she feels that, after all, Hawaii made no mistake when it sought, and eventually won, annexation by the United States.

But Liliuokalani never expresses her opinion. She is before the public but little, and not at all in the public eye. She prefers quiet and peace of old Washington Place. Occasionally she goes driving, and only recently the royal carriage, with its team of the black horses was abandoned for a late model automobile bearing the old Hawaiian crest on the tonneau doors.

Liliuokalani has for some time past been at work on the compilation of a Hawaiian dictionary, which will be the most complete volume of its kind in existence, and a work which undoubtedly will do much toward the perpetuation of the Hawaiian language.

In this book are to be put not only those words used in everyday conversation, but hundreds of ancient words, which, with their meanings, have been long forgotten by all except the more venerable Hawaiians.

It is in hunting out these words and arriving at their true meaning that Liliuokalani is devoting much of her time at present.
