Recommendations that all fowls should be sold by weight, and not by count and that the same be done with commodities now sold by dry measure and a strong renewal of the suggestion that there be a standard weight for a loaf of bread are made by James Sweeney, state chief of standards, in his annual report to Secretary of Internal Affairs Paul W. Houck. Mr. Sweeney's report is filled with a bewildering array of figures of examinations and tests made by sealers of weights and measures throughout the state, the examinations including every thing used for measuring from scales of grocers and coal mines, yard sticks, milk jars and oil pumps.

In urging the amendment to the law relative to sale of poultry the chief says that in many parts of the state chickens and ducks are sold by weight and that it should be uniform, and he says that there should as peckage goods and the net amount of weight be indicated on the outside. Mr. Sweeney says there is no reason why there should not be a standard loaf of bread and voices the belief that if it had not been for the abnormal conditions brought about by the war, there would have been favorable action on the proposed legislation, and he gives warning that after the war people will insist upon knowing what they are buying. There should be a thirty-two ounce and a sixteen ounce loaf.
