Speaks Before Spanish Students on the Value of That Language

Robert B. Reeves, secretary of the Y. M. C. A., gave an interesting and educational address before the members of the Spanish Club at the rooms, Second and State streets, last evening.

The purpose of his address follows: "Spanish will within a few years become the foremost of commercial languages. The attitude of the South Americans up to this time toward their brothers of the north has been that of suspicion and mistrust. They have thought that the North American designs are aggressive, both on their territory and commerce but in the last few years this feeling has disappeared and a more friendly feeling exists between the United States and South America. This is largely due to the policy followed by the Government at Washington, D. C., to create a more harmonious relation between our country and that of South America. The tour of the South American countries by Elihu Root several years ago did much to bring about this understanding and the consistent aim of the Government to cultivate this policy toward these countries has done much to strengthen that closer relation.

"The world war has also brought the South American countries and the United States closer together. Several of the South American countries have severed diplomatic relations with Germany and some have declared war. This will naturally bring about an alignment of the countries that will prove another step in cementing the unity between South America and the United States.

"What will be the result of all this? Simply this, our businessmen will have easier access to South American commercial fields and if they are aggressive and fair in their methods, our trade with South America will be greatly expanded. Another advantage that our businessmen now enjoy is the superior banking facilities made possible in the foreign countries by the foreign branch bank system effected by the new Federal Reserve Act. The National City Bank of New York City has opened several branch banks in South American countries, particularly Brazil and Argentina. This system makes commercial transactions easier and more efficient than formerly when we had no branch banks there.

"Another advantage is that after the war we will have an enlarged merchant marine that will be available for importing and exporting business with foreign countries. This country will doubtless emerge from the war as the strongest maritime power on the face of the earth. This is a natural result of the hundreds of ships this country is building and will build in the near future to transport soldiers and supplies to the war zone. When the war is over these ships will be available in South American trade as well as in other foreign trade routes, and will give our businessmen ample shipping facilities to successfully supply the needs of South American countries. America will also have a freer hand in South America after the war for the competition with Germany will not be so keen as formerly; a preference, doubtless, for England and the United States will be exercised by the Southern Continent peoples. Prior to the war, Germany was rapidly monopolizing the South American trade, with England a close second. The European countries made every scientific study of the needs of that country and were far more efficient than we are in their methods. They gave a longer term of credit than our American merchants do and they sent the finest type of representatives to that continent who could speak Spanish and Portuguese fluently and studied the people carefully, as well as the commercial methods, banking facilities and economic needs. The result was that competitors for this trade were rapidly gaining foothold, while our big businessmen failed to grasp the big opportunities for trade expansion.

"The world gives great advantages if our businessmen will respond by making a more efficient and scientific attack on the problem. There is no trade limit to the trade that may be secured, for competition in the future will be intense because the European countries, especially Germany, will make a fierce effort to regain the lost trade there.

"What I have said in this connection is designed to show you the absolute commercial value of Spanish. There is a great field open to young men in the importing and exporting business as well as in the manufacturing of such products as are sent to foreign countries. Obviously these great business concerns, many of which will have commercial relations with the South American countries, will need young men and women in their employ who can use the Spanish language fluently. Spanish correspondents will be essential. Each office will need such persons who can speak and type in Spanish letters. There are also an unusual opportunity for commercial travelers to go to these South American countries to represent the great concerns there, and they, of course, must necessarily speak Spanish.

"It is a wonderful field—rich in opportunities, and I trust that many young men of this city will avail themselves of the opportunity afforded to take this study by attending our Spanish classes. The classes for the second semester will be opened Thursday, January 3, 1918. These study classes are held every Tuesday and Thursday evenings until the summer. Mrs. Geneva, the teacher in charge, is fully competent to instruct, as demonstrated by her successful record in the past.
