You will hear, off and on, about the various needs of army life. A citizen contemplating service under The Flag thinks of sweaters, uniforms, shoes, boots, woolen helmets and a wide variety of other things that might be needed.

You need something more than a stove and a few pieces of wood to get up thirty minutes before daybreak in a cold tent pitched at the edge of a winter's dawn and make a fire without a thought of complaint.

You need something more than a uniform and good shoes and a sweater to face the endless round of drill, discipline and study in a cheerful frame of mind.

You need a philosophy which will overlook all the annoyances and discomforts and routine in a view of greater things beyond—serving The Flag and winning the war.

When the soldier has arrived at the point where these last two things are the only ones that count his philosophy is completed.

AN EXAMPLE

Here is one illustration that may clear up the discussion a bit. We ran into a lieutenant just back from France.

THE GENERAL IDEA

The above outlines the general idea. Most discomforts, one way or another, have their uses. For one thing, they increase the value of the ordinary comforts of existence.
