Life's Problems Are Discussed

By Mrs. Wilson Woodrow

"Tell me, dear Mrs. Woodrow, why must or should station in life stand out so prominently in the happiness of two people? Why must two persons whose thoughts, ideas and tastes are identical be torn apart, because one was born poor and the other rich? God did not intend money and luxury to be a barrier; then why should man?"

"When I had read this far, I sat up and began to take notice. What were these two loving hearts apart? My correspondent had started off according to all the laws of construction governing modern fiction, with a situation to hold the reader's attention in the first paragraph. As for the question she put me, why should man regard money and luxury as a barrier, I simply murmured: 'This is news to me. I have always believed that man in the mass regarded money and luxury as a goal.'

"She goes on: 'The writer of this note (I have not yet reached my twenty-first birthday) has been reared in one of those distasteful parts of New York, among poor but respectable people. But school and five years in the business world have polished off the rough edges to such an extent that I can truthfully say I am quite at home with refined and cultivated people. Keen observation and much thought have worked wonders, and I have now educated myself so that I feel capable of holding my own anywhere and at any time.

"I have ideas and ideals of which I am proud, and even though the environment in which I have been brought up does not generally foster such ideas, nevertheless I have lived up to them, always hoping for something better, and always happy and contented.

"About a year ago I met a man who proved congenial, and this companionship has caused a deep and noble love to grow between us. However, he is one born and reared in wealth and luxury, well educated and refined. We are deeply attracted, but his people have come between us and have politely but firmly told me, that I was a designing girl who never had had anything and wanted him solely for his money.

"Of course he knows better, and regardless of this wants me to marry him. But I have decided to sacrifice my happiness instead of my self-respect, and have declined to enter a family in which I should

"Don't tell me we have to get ourselves up in evening togs."

"No, indeed, dear. It's going to be an informal dinner. Mrs. Thurston said she would invite no one else, and that we should have just a pleasant evening at cards or something."

"That's fine, just the kind of an evening I like," Warren responded genially.

"I'm going to wear that little georgette crepe dress of mine. You remember, don't you, the evenings we had the Thursdays over here informally? Well, this is a return of that."

"I see," said Warren, to whom the paying of dinner debts and so forth was all Greek.

"I like Mrs. Thurston so much better of late than I ever did before," Helen went on gaily as she slipped into the dress mentioned. "Somehow she seems so much more intimate. I used to think there was a strain of underhandness in her nature, and I'm so glad I was wrong."

"Glad you were wrong about something," mumbled Warren, who had finished his dressing and was ready to start. Come on; aren't you ready?"

"All ready, dear. Just hold my coat for me, will you?"

Helen slipped into her fur coat, ran in for a last look at the sleeping Winifred, looked into the kitchen to give Mary a few last orders and met Warren at the elevator.

"The Thursdays' apartment, which was further uptown, Warren rang the bell and they were admitted by a rather reserved looking maid in a French cap and fluffy apron. Sounds of merriment could be heard from the front, and as Helen was ushered into Mrs. Thurston's room, she saw several expensive looking women's wraps. Mrs. Thurston came into the room almost immediately and Helen gasped out: "Oh, don't take him from me! I love him so. He is all I have in the world."

Quite out of date. You should have received the mother with a pleasant but aloof courtesy, and when she had told you that you were a designing girl and only wanted to marry her son for his money, you should have returned fire with something like this:

"I am so glad that you have brought up this subject, for now I can frankly express my own views and explain my attitude. I hesitated some time before accepting your son, for, although he has enjoyed more advantages than have fallen to my lot, that is, in my estimation, 'Still, so great is my love for your son that I am willing to overlook these facts, although I could never consent to be on terms of intimacy with you or your daughters. Good-by."

Seriously, I fall to see where there is any real barrier between you and your young man, or any occasion to turn to those ultra-conventional referees for the broken-hearted—church and settlement work.

Why manufacture miseries? The world is quite full enough of them without you adding your mite. And take one last word of advice. Enjoy all the motion pictures you please, but don't take them too seriously. Also remember that this is 1918.

Movie Admission Now Costs Seventeen Cents

Managers of motion picture theaters in the central part of the city to-day announced an increase in admission prices to seventeen cents. The admission for adults had been fifteen cents. This latter price was adopted when the war tax on theaters went into effect.

At a meeting of the managers it was decided that soaring costs to secure film releases, and high operating expenses, made the second increase in admission necessary. The increase of salaries and production at the studios has thrown a heavy burden on theater owners, the managers said, and the cost of keeping their theaters in operation, they think, warranted their increase in the admission prices.

SCOUTS TO COLLECT BOOKS

"There are men who have never read a book except their school books; these men all ask for books that may be read aloud and that can be easily understood," says Franklin K. Matthews, chief scout librarian of the Boy Scouts of America who is handling the campaign to supply the Sam Houston library with books. "There is a big demand for boys' books," he adds. "All scouts are requested to work industriously in the week of March 18 to collect books for this end, sending them to the public library for shipment abroad. Books of adventure seem to be most relished and yet only books by approved authors are wanted. The nickel novel in the form of the book-bound thriller will not be accepted."
