THESE MOTHERS KNOW WHAT BONDS MEAN

Liberty Loan! I had! I have not money to give, but my boy lies in a grave over there. With a mother's intuition Mrs. Auran knew when she bade the lad in khaki good-bye it would be forever.

Only One Mother

"I knew when he wrote from Hoboken that they would sail soon that he would never come back. I don't know why I felt so sure. I just did and I told his father so. One day a neighbor gave me a New Testament, which I sent to him, and he wrote me that he read from it every day. I like to remember those things now. There was no keeping him. My father served through the Civil War. One day my mother told him she must never leave her and the children, that they needed him. He told her not to fret and that evening came home wearing the blue! So it was with Earl. He had served his term with the Regular Army, but when he came back to us he was never content. The life of the barracks called him."

But do you not feel proud that your boy died as he did?

"Proud?" Mrs. Auran glanced from the portrait of a chubby-faced lad to the photograph of a soldier in uniform. "I suppose some day that pride will come. Now I only know my baby has been killed by the Germans. America will do this thing, of course; but, oh, God! why does it take so long? How I wish I could go to the trenches and take a hand. How I would fight! I know they don't want us mothers. We are too old and untrained, but we would like the chance to go, just the same. Some say that the Government will take us over to see our graves when the war is ended, but I doubt that. You see, there would be such a vast crowd of broken-hearted mothers for I fear that many, many lads will go to France but few return again. When I see them in the streets in their khaki uniforms, Oh, I love them so! I feel like taking them in my arms and hugging every one. I am only one mother. So many others are suffering, too. If I did not think that sometimes I would go mad, but my faith has never wavered. When I read of a German victory I can smile because I know it is but for a little while. I want to see Harrisburg go over the top in this drive because the victory is coming."

Another service flag, with its star faded and weather worn, hangs over the door of a humble home in North street, from which Sylvester Sullivan, a youth of 24, sailed away with the Rainbow Division last autumn and passed into the Great Unknown on St. Patrick's Day in the performance of his duty. His white-haired mother's lips trembled when she spoke of this son, one of eight, for whose return she had been planning. "Last Saturday was his birthday. See what I got for him. I thought he would like it," she said, pointing to a little flag in the window. From a rounded base arose four small silk flags, English, French, American and the flag of service.

"Liberty Bonds? Do we know what they mean? Do we? Even my youngest boy, who works in a printer, is buying a $200 one. My other lads have them; my son-in-law has bought for the children. If I can, I want to get one myself after a while."

"My soldier son, my Sylvester, wanted to go. Yes, I am proud of him. It is a wonderful thing to die that others may live. It is for them we are fighting (with a wave of her hand toward her 6-year-old grandchild), for can we see the children hurt? Can we see those awful Germans come down this street and murder our babies like they do over there? Oh, if I could go, if I could go! I'd like to have a chance at the Kaiser myself. I would wait and watch a month gladly for the moment to come. I have not been able to sleep at night since they killed my boy. Oh, I would show them! But they will get that beast yet and when they do it will be from above, through the air. When it happens, I shall get down on my knees for an hour!"
