Commenting on this, Dr. Muehlon says:

"The guests could hardly do otherwise when thus bidden by their imperial host in his own castle to shake hands with him and thus a vow was extorted which would be of value only if given freely."

Dr. Muehlon declares that the order issued by the crown prince of Bavaria to the troops in Belgium amounted to a command to give no quarter to prisoners. He adds:
"I have received a letter from the field which brings me the unheard of information that the emperor has himself said he had enough prisoners and has told his officers he hoped they would take good care to make no more prisoners. This news is quite authentic."

Another indication that the French strategists have outguessed the German general staff is seen in the fact that the original strength used by the crown prince in the Aisne drive was put at 25 divisions. He has since employed in this theater double that number.

The critical battle, the final German effort to break through to the channel coast, will be fought, officers believe, before Foch finds himself able to turn the tables on the enemy and to begin what they are critain will be a march to Berlin if complete victory cannot be won short of that goal.

The conclusion is based on the opinion strongly held by some officials that the drive was designed to draw off reserves from the Amiens and Flanders sectors. An attack on the American sector in such strength as to drive the line back, it is argued, might hamper General Foch in his employment of American units to support his lines in Picardy, Flanders and the Aisne regions.

Foch Outguessed Enemy
Officers regard the fact that no new blow has been struck at the Amiens front as conclusive evidence that General Foch outguessed his opponents when he determined to let the Aisne front stand on its own strength, even at the cost of much territory overrun by the enemy until he could assemble additional units from scattered points along the line beyond Rheims. The very success of the Germans in pressing on to the banks of the Marne, it was argued, meant that Foch was resolved not to weaken his lines to the north.
