FLYING WITH SHAFFER

LETTERS FROM A DAUPHIN BOY TO HIS MOTHER

Escadrille Spad 33, Secteur "Pochois", June 4, 1918. Dear Mother: Before I say anything further I want to tell you not to get any more letters from me. I will send you no more letters than I can. I don't have time to write you now. I have just received the ones you already have addressed that way, for I think I have lost none; but it would be safer if you should get no more letters from me. I am at 31 Avenue Montaigne, Paris, as you used to. I don't know why you stopped before, but now you are needed more than ever. I not only have been changed to another escadrille, but am in a "groupe de combat."

It isn't necessary to translate that. It means just what it says. In short, being in a combat escadrille means we will be sent wherever the Huns begin raising Cain. That being right here at present, down to us, we are. To-day we were moved about six miles nearer the lines, so were busy most of the day packing and unpacking.

In our new quarters the electricity is not working, so we use a small essence lamp, which is indeed quite an improvement on the candle.

Things a Happening

"Things" have indeed been happening swiftly for the last few days. First came the change of escadrilles, and before I knew it, I was aboard a strange plane—to me, armed with two guns and enough shells to run a submarine. Naturally, I had trouble learning how to handle my new steed with its numerous instruments. Just to show you how much we have to think about, one of the other Americans in the escadrille was so busy watching his different dials to see what his engine was doing, he forgot to look out for Boche. Finally, when he did look up from the cockpit, there was a Boche right on him. Making a turn and dive to avoid his fire, he nearly ran into another one. However, I finally got the hang of the thing, the occasion being a Protection "mission."

There were two of us Spads for protection, two big biplane planes. Going over the lines at a 3,000 meter height the "archies" were soon peeping away at us merrily, and it wasn't more than two minutes later that we were being shot at. As we saw them in the distance and immediately climbed up to do my bit in chasing them off. Twice I plunged down at an ambitious Hun, but he shot both guns rattled away vigorously, it didn't seem to affect the Boche's aim, and then I remembered I had a sight on the gun which might be better than watching the tracing of my bullet. I do like to use the sight, because one has to close one eye to aim, and there are so many things to watch out for that two eyes are not nearly enough. After a few minutes of this sort of thing, I decided to try the sight. I looked around for a Hun in a favorable position to try it on—and there was one. I pulled the trigger, the Hun's "Alabattross" in this case) having a round-shaped tail, while the Spad is more oblong. After a few minutes of this sort of thing, I decided to try the sight. I pulled the trigger, the Hun's "Alabattross" in this case) having a round-shaped tail, while the Spad is more oblong.

A Bend on the Hun

Then down I dove and just forgetting to wink at this "blackbird" but a flick of his tail rewarded my efforts, and not wishing to drop into the whole nest of them, I pulled up to six hundred yards, both jammed. It was impossible to fix one in the air, but I still had one left and seeing one little "Willie Hindenburg" some distance away from his patrol, I pointed an "Alabattross" at him, and started to turn toward me, but I had a bead right on him, and could see the bullets going into him. They didn't seem to be taking effect though, for he continued to turn and finally got headed direct for me. Only 30 meters separated us then—he going over a 100 miles an hour and I going some 130, and coming head on.

Chased by the Boche

That was bad enough as it was, but then horrors of horrors! My motor stopped and I had to dive. And to dive! I had to go down 2,500 meters before the engine worked again, with me doing an aerial tango the whole way down. Talk about the "impression" of instantaneous death! I ain't afraid to believe Dad, for he makes the assertion quite often. Since both guns were utterly useless, there was nothing for me to do, but go home; but I climbed up again to see where the photo planes were anyway, as it's an ironclad rule never to leave the planes you're protecting. They had probably gone home though, for I could find them no where, so I did likewise. And then I discovered that my second gun had not jammed, but ran out of cartridges. I had some 400 shots and all the damage done was so many holes in the atmosphere. Pretty rank shooting eh? However, don't forget one has to aim these machines to shoot, and this was a new plane to me.

Lost in the Air

The next day I was sent up with another American to patrol at 6,000 meters for the Boche's photo Zings which come over so regularly and I was alone. I was flying over some miles away, a mere speck in the distance. Having been duly impressed by my new commander (Madon, the famous French ace) to watch out for him, as he was new on the lines, and thinking he was lost I started after him, and by the time I got near him, I was lost myself—wholly and completely.

Contrary Becky

The sun was in the wrong place, and Chalons, which I was flying over looked like Rheims, and then my comrade dove through a cloud and I lost him for good. It was a punk day anyway, the ground being constantly obscured by clouds, and thinking I was over Rheims I headed south, but not a familiar landmark was in view. Finally I admitted to myself I was lost and seeing an aviation field nearby, came down to land and see where I was—and smashed the "Becky" on landing.
