Little Talks by Beatrice Fairfax

Whenever I get a letter from a correspondent beginning, "My husband is the best man in the world, but..." Then I know that the wife of his bosom is going to clear out the card index with her mental keeping for years in regard to him, and start all over again with fresh reserves of patience, tenderness and affection.

For love may be blind, but the most loving wife seldom is. And the "blind" wife never really holds her husband like the one who is in full possession of all her faculties. Her "blindness" means she is deficient in those womanly intuitions that enable a little ninety-pound wife of femininity to twist a two hundred-pound husband around her finger and have him rejoice in his subjugation.

For because of the long, black night of medievalism from which women are just beginning to emerge, she is still a creature of intuitive impulse—and her intuitions are invariably right.

Intuitions were originally the method of protection supplied by nature, during long eons of time to defend her from creatures of greater physical strength. To enable her to secure greater tolerance for herself and her children the wife of the cave-man knew she must please. She knew that she enjoyed the shelter of the cave, subject to the same man's whim. And if he got "mad" he would be likely to cudgel her and her children out of doors to take their chances with weather and wild beasts.

A Question of Survival
She gauged her lord and master's moods carefully, as it was a question of survival with her. So you may be sure that sitting in a dark corner of the cavern, patching with her bone needle the cave man's fur shoulder cape or his "Mary Garden throw," or whatever he may have called his best fur set, that she studied his mood thoroughly and exhaustively before she made any suggestions of a personal or business nature.

From the intense study of symptoms she evolved a magical sense of clairvoyance in regard to people which we call, at the present time, "feminine intuitions." And these same intuitions were the weapons that stayed by, and along with the material instinct, helped to develop her through the long ages, from the uncouth, dirty, grunting cave-woman, into the exquisitely dressed, coiffed, groomed, manicured product we see to-day.

And the modern woman has still kept cave-great, great, great—and come hundred times more great-grandmother's marvelous legacy. With this talisman, she still gauges the moods of the cave-man's magic descendants and works her magic—black or white—accordingly. And sometimes she applies the talisman to her fellow-woman, only she, too, has the intuitive method to fall back on, and it becomes a case of diamond-cut diamond with the ladies, and is not to be depended upon as in the case of a poor, defenseless male.

Too Busy For Intuitions
Back in the good old cave days, he was so busy hunting for food and furs that he had no time to cultivate his masculine intuitions, which accounts for the fact that he hasn't any worth mentioning to-day. So he must depend on a bleak process called logic, for getting himself out of his difficulties, and staving off "feminine intuitions" from various quarters.

So when people say a woman is "utterly blind" to her husband it does not mean that she loves him any more deeply than the wife who sees. Only that nature has "nursed her up," forgotten to endow her with this very valuable inheritance.

But the triumph of love is, when a wife not only sees all the strength and weakness, good and bad, the scrap of divinity along with the scrap of Satan, that goes to make up her man, yet loves him through thick and thin in spite of everything.

It is the kind of love that endures, in spite of the ravages of ill-fortune, through better or worse, "until death us do part." The married love that has a large element of the maternal in its make-up, appears to have the most enduring qualities. And material love surely sees, even when it affects to be blind.

It is for this reason, in all probability, that marriages between older women and younger men are so often conspicuously successful. The older wife makes allowances where a girl lacking in any acquired knowledge of human nature, is apt to expect too much of her Prince Charming.

A Skilled Weather Prophet
The young girls intuitions also are less well developed than those of the older woman; she has not yet acquired that exquisite fineness in anticipating what we may call "barometrical conditions," otherwise she has not become the skilled domestic weather prophet that the

"When a Girl Marries"

I have failed Jim! This sentence keeps ringing over and over in my head: "I have failed Jim."

There is no excuse for me. Four days ago I married the man I love better than any other being on earth, and tonight—tonight, by having like an awkward school girl with stupid prejudices and ungracious manners—I have shamed him before his friends.

Can I find any excuse for myself? When we came through the terraced court-yard of Towers—by—the sea to the great oval room crowded with tier upon tier and ring upon ring of laughing, shouting human beings. I felt as if all the three-ringed circles in the world had been congregated in one spot and were competing against each other to make more noise than any human being ever before had heard. It fairly deafened me and made me dizzy.

"Have you never been here?" Jim seemed amused by my shrinking and the way I clung to his arm. I felt as if I were accused of some horrid crime and misdemeanor—prim and unpopular, undesirable.

"Well, you see," I hesitated, "I've only lived in New York three years, and the Haldane's magazine crowd doesn't exactly fit in with these—interior decorations."

Jim gave my arm a quick squeeze and laughed: "They are interior decorations! Their materials are champagne and guinea hen and strawberries out of season. You have a way of giving people up, little Princess."

Just at first we couldn't find Betty Bryce's table. My heart beat fast—perhaps we would not be able to locate her in that great hurly-burly! But Jim turned to a waiter who led us to our party. That waiter seemed either very much impressed or very much amused because we were friends of Mrs. Bryce's.

How to Conserve Canning and Packing For Winter's Use Explained in Detail by National War Garden Experts.

CANNING LIMA BEANS
Lima beans should be canned the same day on which they are picked. This point is covered fully in the canning and drying book which the National War Garden Commission, Washington, will send to you on request. A 2-cent stamp to cover postage should be enclosed.

The beans should be in prime condition, and shelled and sorted carefully. The large ones are often canned for soustash. After shelling do not wash. Blanch five minutes. Cold dip and pack in jars, taking care not to break the skins. Broken beans will cause a cloudiness in the liquid. Add one level teaspoon salt to each quart and pour in boiling water to cover. Put on rubber and top and adjust top ball, or screw on top with thumb and little finger.

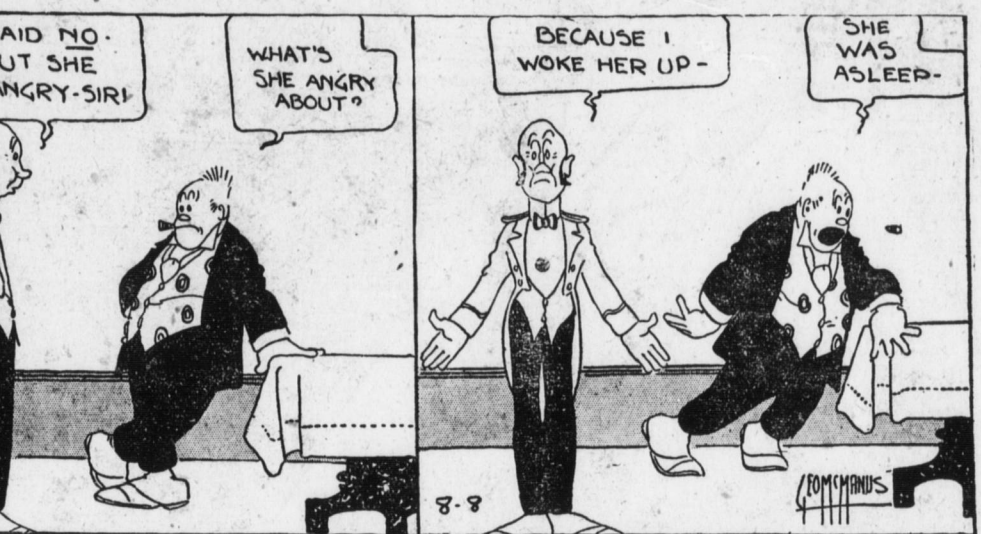

Sterilize 180 minutes in hot water bath or 90 minutes at five to ten pounds' steam pressure. Remove, seal tight at once and cool. The commission will be glad to answer any questions written on one side of the paper and sent in a self-addressed stamped envelope.

FASHION'S FORECAST

(By Annabel Worthington)

A very striking combination of materials is the secret of the smartness of this dress, No. 8872. It is really very simple to make, for the upper part is all in one piece from the shoulders to where the skirt section joins it. The closing is made at center front with a row of tiny buttons set very close together. The long, close-fitting sleeves are trimmed with material to match the skirt. A very narrow belt with crossed ends marks the waistline. The two piece skirt has large pockets at the front and is gathered across the back. The lady's dress pattern No. 8872 is cut in four sizes—36 to 42 inches bust measure. Width at lower edge of skirt is 1 1/2 yards. The 36 inch size requires 1 3/4 yards 36 inch light material and 2 3/4 yards 36 inch dark material. Price cents.

NO MORE CARD PLAYING
Card playing on trains must be stopped during the war, according to orders of the Federal train management. Card playing produces the "seat hog," who holds four seats in a crowded train for his companions in whist or pinochle. The games also cause disturbances, annoying other passengers it is said.
