STATE SOLDIERS UNDER HUN FIRE DID NOT FALTER

Leader of Company A, 109th Machine Gun Battalion, Relates Pursuit

FOR 27 days and nights Pennsylvania soldiers pushed forward after the retreating Hun. The American soldiers were members of the 109th machine gun battalion, of the Iron division of former Pennsylvania guardsmen. Their gallant advance under fire is described by Captain William C. Rehm, of Lancaster, commanding Company A. This battalion, attached to the Fifty-sixth infantry brigade, was formed of companies from Lancaster, Columbia, Bethlehem, Allentown and Philadelphia.

"Day and night we marched through mud, rain and sunshine, heat and cold," says Captain Rehm. "We were continually under gun fire and gas attacks, without being able to get any guns in action. The enemy's rear guard defense was the only thing that saved him from annihilation or capture. Passing over the battlefields, we were in constant observation from airplanes and balloons, and as a result he put down a heavy barrage that worked the devil with us. I wish you could see my boys. Such a ragged, dirty, determined-looking lot of fighters, full of grim courage. They all received their baptism of fire at Chateau Thierry, and behaved splendidly, while shells, high explosives, shrapnel and gas were dropping every minute everywhere. No One Faltered. On we went, ducking when shells approached, dropping on our bellies when half a shell tumbled down. It was hell, and it kept up all night, and yet not a man showed a yellow streak. It was our first experience. Since then we have become used to it."

Up to July 31, the captain wrote, the battalion had suffered no casualties. Since then word has been received that Private Howard W. Shue, of Company H, has been wounded. His home is in Schaefferstown. Two Lancaster men in the 108th machine gun battalion, of the same division, are commended for bravery in a letter from Sergeant Herman H. Nies, also of Lancaster. They are Carl McConomy and Harry Greiner, both with the medical detachment of the battalion.

These two men went out under heavy shellfire to rescue wounded. Earl Ryan, also of Lancaster, of the 151st machine gun battalion, has been wounded for the second time. "We went through a pretty rough campaign," he writes, "but we drove the Boche back and are happy." In his last letter to his home at Milton, Lieutenant Colonel Wallace W. Fetzer, killed in action, described some of the terrific fighting through which he had passed. Colonel Fetzer was superintendent of schools at Milton.

"Safe and well," he wrote on July 26. "In all seriousness I say 'Thank God.' I suppose you read of the battle beginning July 14-15 at midnight, and not yet over, although things are quiet just now. Let me say I was in the first line in one of the fiercest parts of the fight from Sunday night to Tuesday morning, attached to a French regiment with some of the American troops and the French colonel told me we had passed through one of the fiercest bombardments he had ever been in. I have had high explosives bursting around me, machine gun and rifle fire at my feet and around my head. Americans are brave men, and America can feel proud of her soldiers."

French Fearless Under Fire "I admire the French soldiers I saw. They are absolutely fearless. I saw them walking about with their canes swinging as though they were walking down Broadway. Shells were bursting and machine gun fire was likely to strike them any moment. We lay out in the open all night under fire and slept through it." Colonel Fetzer was with the 110th infantry of the Iron division. Additional casualties reported from this regiment indicate the terrific character of the fighting through which it has passed.

Duncan McIntyre and Bernard Robison, of Company G, Altoona, are missing. Private Willis L. Strouse, of Sunbury, a wagoner with the One Hundred and Tenth, was killed in action. From the One Hundred and Eleventh Infantry, B. F. Smith, Jr., of Company B, whose home is in Westmoreland county, is recovering from a gas attack. From the One Hundred and Twelfth, Clair J. Fry, of Company M, of McVeytown, was wounded July 18.

"We have the hellish Boche on the run and are after him with a vengeance," writes Captain H. Harper, of New Castle, a medical officer with the Iron division. Charles F. Evans, of Pottsville, with Company C, One Hundred and Third Engineers, has been wounded, bringing the total casualties of this company up to fifteen. Company D, of the same unit, recruited at Pottsville, has had nearly fifty casualties.

Lieutenant Charles B. Seely, of Williamsport, a dental officer with the One Hundred and Third Engineers, in a letter written July 27, tells of the part the Pennsylvanians played in the Marne fighting when a majority of these casualties occurred. "This regiment was the first of the Twenty-eighth division to get into action, and naturally the first to be at the front," says Lieutenant Seely. "We also had the first casualties."

"When the Hun started the offensive on July 15, we were busy for thirty-six hours straight, but there were very few serious cases—mostly minor and gassed cases. The outlook for the war for the Allies is very promising. I think it is only a matter of time. The French claim December will end it, and I think it will soon break. The French say the American infantry are crazy because they are so fearless, and the American artillery, they say, are drunk because they shoot so damned often and accurate."

"The colonel just came in telling us it is all off. The artillery bombarded for three hours this afternoon, and the Huns retreated back over the river Ourcq. They are afraid to fight the Americans. The Twenty-eighth division is sure making a wonderful name for itself. Two drafted boys from the state have been killed in action. They were Oliver G. Sollenberger, of Mount Bethel, and Robert F. Sollenberger, of Williamsburg. Sollenberger, who was with Company C, Three Hundred and Nineteenth Infantry, was drafted April 3 and trained at Camp Lee. Captain H. F. Sleppey, formerly of Northumberland, was killed in action August 13, while serving with the Fourth Engineers. Lieutenant Karl L. Knecht, of Allentown, with Company C, Forty-seventh Infantry, was killed in action July 31. Private Horace L. Laysar, of Millcreek township, Lebanon county, was killed in action July 18. Private Raymond Borofsky, of Shenandoah, with the Thirty-ninth Infantry, was killed on July 15, and Sergeant Anthony Scanlan, Sixteenth Infantry, and Private John Rosomowitz, Twenty-eighth Infantry, both of Shenandoah, were wounded July 20.

Mechanic O. D. Eckman, of Lancaster, was wounded August 11. John W. Lauffer, Company D, One Hundred and Fiftieth Machine Gun Battalion, of Greensburg, was wounded. From the Marines, Private Alvin E. Long, of Hickory Corners, was killed in action; John E. Bard, of Lancaster, is missing, and John McCullen, of Sharon, was wounded.

Mrs. A. L. Hawkins, of Washington, Pa., has received word that her son, Frank B. Hawkins, has been made colonel of the Three Hundred and Fifty-third Infantry, now in France. He is a son of the late Colonel A. L. Hawkins, commander of the Fighting Tenth in the Philippines campaign, of the Spanish American War. Young Hawkins was a captain in the Tenth in that campaign under his father and entered the Regular Army. He was lieutenant colonel of his regiment when it sailed. His brother, Clyde Hawkins, is colonel of the Three Hundred and Fifty-second U. S. Infantry. The unusual condition thus presents itself of a father and two sons as army colonels.
