mans bombarded the town with heavy guns and aerial bombs. German aviators endeavored to drive the Americans from the houses in Flamette, so that German machine gunners in the hills could pick them off. One German airplane decended within 500 feet of the Fismette roofs, firing machine guns. The Americans drove it away with their machine guns. The Americans are holding Fismette securely. German artillery continued to bombard the village at intervals during the day. The American attack on Bazoches was made in daylight and the Americans improved their positions, although the Germans resisted stubornly. "We had to go very slow in order to keep about fifty yards behind the taks. We had to stop very often, as the tanks moved very slowly. All the time we were going, the Huns weren't sleeping. They sure were doing their best to stop the war for all of us. Machine gin builtets were hitting the ground all around us and whizzing by in a steady stream, and big shells breaking all around. To hear a big piece go by like lightining. I can't imagine how any of us came out of it alive or not wounded.

"I had about the most narrow escape than at any time since I have been in battle. Those big shells just tore the immense concrete walls from in front of me. But the only things that happened to me were a few dents in my iron hat. My pal in arms was taken to a hospital with wounds caused by shraphel and flying bricks.

"We get frequent gas attacks by the Fritzies, but they seem to succeed very little, as we are using the best gas mask, I think, of any nation over here. In fact, I know it.

Although parents of Corporal L. E. Neary, of the marines, of Carbondale, got word recently that he had been wounded on June 16, they have a letter written by their son on August 5, his birthday.

"It's a long way from this birthday to the last," he writes to his mother. "I have nothing to regret, feeling I am doing my duty as you and Dad would wish me to do. And let this generation wind it up for all time, so that Bayard, Eugene and others of their age will not have to go out to make the sacrifice that was expected from us. And I hope that you and Dad can see it as I do."

The story of the start of Marshal Foch's flank drive, which broke the German hold on the Marne river, is told by Private Roy J. Robbins, of the Marines, in letter to his home, at Collingdale.

Private Robbins is one of twenty-three members of a Sunday school class at Collingdale in the service. The class originally had thirty-five members. Nine of them are in the Marines. Recovering from gas, Robbins writes from a rest billet "away from the sound of shells."

"We were resting on the banks of the Marne," he writes, "living in a patch of woods with no shelter, only what you could improvise. We were there about a week, expecting every day to move back to some big town and get good billets and a good rest. "Well, the looked-for order came along one day to move out. We all thought our division was going back to recuperate and train the new men, the replacements who were to fill the gaps made at Belleau wood and Chateau Thierry, We were under that impression until we hiked a few hours and got into big autotrucks at midnight.

mours and got into big autorities at midnight.

"They whisked us away to a new front. I guess you know what one, as we were the Americans that started the first day. We rode all night and next day and landed at our destination, a big woods.

"At 4 a. m. I got up to go on guard, to look for gas, etc. At 4.30. I came near jumping out of my skin, as it seemed all the big guns in the war were firing on me. But then in a minute I realized we were sending over the worst barrage I had ever over the worst barrage I had ever heard.

"The guns were a little piece behind up and I could see the flash as they fired. It was a rolling barrage and as we afterward found it, the Americans and French were walking over fields right behind it. They say it was a perfect barrage.

"We traveled that night, starting about 7 o'clock and walked until dark. Then we slept in a ravine where the Huns had their artillery the night before. Their guns were there yet. Welf, we hit the deck at 8.30 a. m. and threw everything we had in one pile to be left there, and just kept one blanket, mess gear, 'gat' and gas mask.

"I had the machine gun on my shoulder. Of course, we would trade off, changing one fellow's load to another, but they were all heavy. We walked at least seven or eight miles that morning, over hills, down valleys, over fields, along roads, and everywhere we could see the story of the Hun flight.

"Once a plane swooped down and began firing at us, but we ducked into the woods and he had to give up. Later I saw a Hun brought down, and I hope it was the same square-head.

"Well, at least about 8 a. m. we reached our destination, the last town captured the day before and the signs of the Germans were still there. It was here that our boys took 300 Huns and a count in a big cave. There were plenty of signs around printed in German.

Changed Street's Name
"On one street was a signboard 'Hindenburg Strasse.' One of the boys knocked it down and turned it over and put 'Marine Avenue' on it."

"We soon found out that we were to start out on the fields outside of the town and go across a level stretch to a point six kilometers away. We could see a town in the distance, and that was our objective. We marched out to a large wheat field and started to deploy ready for our share.

"All the time we were there the Huns were sending over their hate in the form of 'big heavies.' We had to wait out there a half hour before the tanks came on the scene. They were the big, slow type. We let them

Would Hang Kaiser and His Six Sons

Philadelphia, Aug. 28.—Expressing a fervent desire that the United States might capture the Kaiser and his six sons and try them before an American jury for murder and in a state that permits hanging, Governor Warren L. Harding, Jowa, last night brought thous their feet in a wild outburst cheering in Independence Square. The cloquent and virile Western Executive was the principal speaker at the antional Patriotic Fraternal Conclave in a rally that set a high water mark for record-breaking attendance at the nation's shrine.

One-half pound per week, or three teaspoonfuls per day. This is what the U.S. Food Administration requests that you confine yourself too. Any excess of this amount deprives someone else of their share.

The sweets of life in the way of dainties are tempting but they should be sparingly used at present in order that our Allies may have what is necessary for their soldiers and families, as well as our own. Our boys who have gone to the front have denied themselves of most of the pleasures in life in order to serve you, this is but one of the small ways in which you can serve them. Use
