Over the field the American infantry remained in the positions they had held last night. Dug in behind almost every little rise on the plateau and on the hillside, they awaited the order to attack. Closer to the German positions scores of shell holes sheltered the men from the sweeping machine gun fire, while further to the rear there were companies waiting to be called to their support.

The artillery went into the action early in the morning, not in barrage, but firing first, at one point in the German lines and then at another, in accordance with reports indicating

German lines and then at another, in accordance with reports indicating places where the Germans were mobilizing or where there might be danger of a concentration. Rarely, if ever, have the American troops delivered over such a period so continuous a fire. It was of a punishing character that must have wrought terrible destruction, and probably much demoralization.
