TELLS MOTHER HOW BROTHER DIED FOR NATION

Private Westfall Gives Details of Tragic Event During Battle

Adjoining his mother not to worry and reminding her that one's "luck can't last all the time," Frank Westfall serving with the American Army in France, has written a manly, but pathetic, letter to his mother living in Mechanicsburg, verifying and describing the death of his brother, John Westfall, in action at the front.

Young Westfall's death was announced in the casualty list of the War Department some days ago. After voicing the assumption that his mother has received a telegram of sympathy from the War Department by this time, Westfall, with evident reluctance, but not without writing partly as follows to his parent:

"You know we can't all come back, mother, there are some of us that must stay over here and I had been quite lucky for some time and I dare say that we often wondered if we were to be killed one of the hot places. But we were out here all the time and John was the first to run to the end of his luck. He was always up and ready to do his bit at all times and under any condition and although he was not wearing a badge for bravery, he was as brave as anyone who ever wore a D. S. C.

Describing the "supreme sacrifice" made by his brother on democracy's altar, Frank continues: "We went into position on the sixth or seventh" (of August). "I can't remember just which it was but it did good work while it lasted. John had shot up several of the Hun's positions and did them an awful lot of damage before they got the range on us. The second shell that came over hit near his gun and he was killed. John was hit and I went to his aid, but there was nothing to be done for him. He did not suffer but passed away very peacefully."

While trying to aid his brother, writes Frank the latter was severely gassed and was taken to a base hospital from which place he wrote the letter here. John was buried with full military honors near the spot where he fell. He was given extraordinary fine burial," states the letter. "His body was buried with a wooden cross about two and a half feet high." The letter was dated August 16.
