

STAMM FORESEES ADVANCE AFTER WAR

In proportion to the interest of the public in them and bespeaks for their administration a "more intelligent, kindly and sympathetic criticism."

"The stupid notion that the accident of birth, breeding or money confers an excellency that may be lost by contact with others who have not met with the same accident is not yet quite dead in the land," said Mr. Stamm, "but it is fast giving place to the true ideas, on the one hand, that these things spell only opportunity and responsibility, and on the other hand that a man lives truly only as he realizes that any other man, no matter what his status may be, may help him in solving the problems of his life."

"To get even a faint view of the broadening, strengthening life-giving influence of the public school," he continued, "wherein talent and mediocrity, wealth and poverty, culture and rudeness, and the varying race, and national and religious notions and ideas of men act and react upon each other, under the direction of trained and devoted teachers, administering a system of education that reflects and expresses the best thought and conscience of the times, is to get some view of the possible attainment of democracy in America, is to get some assurance that this government of the people, by the people, for the people is no longer an experiment, and that it will eventually show to all peoples and nations the way of government wherein the doctrine of the brotherhood of man is no idle dream, but rather the nucleus for the attainment of the fullness of life and liberty and the fruition of happiness. Is it not something to hope for that this eventually our system of public education shall be so broad in its scope and so fine in its quality that it may afford the child of the poorest an opportunity for all the education he is capable of absorbing, the best that money and talent can produce, and so fine that the poorest manual laborer cannot afford to neglect it?"

Hope of the War
"There is a widespread feeling throughout the land that when the war shall be won and the soldiers shall return, some things are going to be different, because not only the men overseas who have helped with the war, will have learned some things from contact with each other, but the different outlook on life; and this feeling is sometimes referred to with apprehension. But there is no need for apprehension, for the things that will be different, let us hope, for instance, that through the elimination of a variety of forms of special privilege and through the better education of head and heart, there will be a more general and therefore a more equitable distribution of the fruits of the different labor, and we hope that the strong man and the weak man, the poor man and the man who is not poor, the employer and the employe, the man of high ideals and the man of uncertain standards, the broad man and the narrow man, all now serving together in the great public school of the army at the front and the army behind the man behind the guns, may settle down to the vocations of peace, looking upon each other with the same respect and admiration, and may have taken a long step toward the realization of the brotherhood of man, and the fatherhood of God, and be better prepared to solve the problems of living upon the basis of all for each and each for all."

"There will be restlessness when the war is over, but let us be restless only if there shall be restlessness. Restlessness is a good thing. Restlessness is the mother of progress. Restlessness is the mother of invention. Restlessness is the mother of discovery. Restlessness is the mother of improvement. Restlessness is the mother of advancement. Restlessness is the mother of civilization. Restlessness is the mother of progress. Restlessness is the mother of invention. Restlessness is the mother of discovery. Restlessness is the mother of improvement. Restlessness is the mother of advancement. Restlessness is the mother of civilization."

denotes change and change is necessary for growth, and is always the accomplishment of growth. When there are no questions to be answered, no problems to be solved, then we allow ourselves to be frightened by phrases. There are perhaps nearly as many different forms of socialism as there are people who use the word. Our public school system itself is in the highest degree socialistic in a proper sense; and it may well be that the true relation of man to man in government, based upon the theory of essential equality, may be properly described as socialism.

Only the Beginning
"But the changes that will take place when the war is over will be only the beginnings of great changes, and the boys and girls who are now in the schools, and the boys and girls who are yet to go into the schools, will be the men and women who will have to carry their own heavy load in the solution of the problems of democracy; for democracy can never be a finished product. The important thing for this day is to see to it that the people are so educated that they can discriminate between the true and the false, and that they are prepared to meet the tremendous problems that will present themselves. The system of public education provides a most important means for this preparation."

"Our own public schools are good; they can be made better. They are what the people are satisfied with; they will be better when our people want them to be better. Our people will want them to be better when they realize their importance to the nation, and when they see the utmost importance that they shall continue to develop, and that they shall develop more rapidly than they have now. If we are to do the most we can do and ought to do to make the world safe for democracy, and American democracy safe for the world, there must be more interest among the thinking people of Harrisburg in our own public schools, and in the public school system, more willingness to lend a hand in the development of the schools, and more intelligent, kindly and sympathetic criticism of their administration."

"There needs to be a clearer and livelier concept of the position of supreme importance that they occupy in our governmental system. They are vastly better than they were twenty-five years ago, as they were better than they were twenty-five years before; but they are not finished, and they never can be finished. A real excellence of anything that has life in it is its ability of greater worth in the future, and this is true of our public school system."

Victory Flour Finds Favor With Cooks
The price quoted for the mixture is 80 cents per twelve-pound sack. Wheat flour is 85 cents per twelve-pound sack, but it comes usually in twelve-pound sacks.
Patriotic Necessity
The Food Administration of Dauphin county is encouraging the purchase of victory flour by housewives for two reasons. It complies with the government wheat saving program, by automatically insuring the purchase of substitutes with wheat.
It saves labor for the retailers. Clerks do not have to dip into bins and weigh out substitutes when Victory flour is purchased, as they do when they sell wheat flour. Moreover it insures the use of the substitutes, whereas housekeepers who purchase wheat flour often do not make use of it, and the surplus pound of cereal substitute must be sold with every four pounds of wheat flour.
Retail grocers said to-day that only a fourth as much Victory flour as wheat flour is being purchased by their customers. They say this is because the customers have not been educated to its use, and when they become educated they will purchase it exclusively and relieve themselves of the necessity of purchasing and using substitutes separately.
Experienced bakers say the Victory flour as mixed by experienced bakers can be used for almost any use as can the wheat flour with as good results.
Local millers manufacture Victory flour. Local wholesalers have it in stock.

MRS. BRUMBAUGH AIDS BELGIANS

FOR THE BELGIANS
Mrs. M. G. Brumbaugh, "First Lady of the State" has asked full co-operation of Harrisburgers in the Belgian Clothing Campaign in a statement issued this morning.
"Will you accept some soiled samples of clothing?" a drummer inquired of the headquarters workers. "I have a good sample of clothing," one from him.

With a faded blue coat came a note written on a piece of paper wrapped around a dime. "This is for the Red Cross," the note said. It was a widow's mite! Have you given your share?"

The garments into piles. Department stores and many other small marts are contributing, packing cases and boxes for shipping the goods direct to the port of embarkation.
Melting Pot
A second Red Cross melting pot being formed with the articles found in pockets. A book of engraved names carries several watch chains, rubber bands, collar buttons, matches by the dozen, spectacles, tailors' chalk and a like array of articles. The attendees in men's clothing. "Women don't have pockets," they can't put powder puffs in 'em," a worker explained.

Mrs. Martin B. Brumbaugh telephoned that she would bring some of the Governor's clothing and some of her own to be sent across the ocean. "I surely will do all I can," she told a Telegraph representative.
The telephone at Red Cross headquarters was kept busy all the day, summoning motor messengers and trucks to homes of contributors. In many neighborhoods, a woman would volunteer to collect clothing and several trucks were required to haul the material to headquarters. Incidentally it is requested that anyone having clothing to contribute should call Red Cross headquarters at 1000 North Bell; or Mrs. William Strouse, 1903 on the Bell, and a truck will call. It is also emphasized that clothing should be ready when the trucks call because it is not ready a second trip is necessary.
Mrs. Brumbaugh has made the following appeal in behalf of the children of Belgium:
"The crying of the suffering children of Belgium for clothing should touch the heart of every woman. All garments not really needed, now at hand, should be given to the committee at once. I urge you to search the garrets, bureaus, wardrobes and other storage places with a generous heart. Give your goods as they are. Even the mothers of the splendid men in uniform might aid by giving the clothes of their loved ones. It would be a fitting and noble cause. Surely the women of America will see to it that these poor sufferers are made warm in the approaching winter weather."
