MAKING THE MOST OF OUR CHILDREN

A Series of Plain Talks to Parents By Ray C. Beery, A.B., M.A. President of the Parents Association. (Copyrighted, 1918, by The Parents Association, Inc.) No. 27. Should We Reward Children For Doing Errands?

IMAGINE a child, on being asked to run a simple errand, replying, "What will you give me?" And yet, that's about what many children do, practically, who have been paid for errands. If the task looks too big, they either refuse or whine and put it off indefinitely which amounts to the same thing. The big trouble with the reward system is the inevitable suggestion that it is necessary to secure action on the child's part, thus shifting the basis of obedience from confidence to that of material reward. One mother writes: "My uncle's child of six years is never allowed to take money for errands or favors of any kind. He is a very willing little fellow but he always refuses money, saying, 'Because Daddy won't let me take it.' It seems to me that a child should in some way be rewarded—not every time but in some way. How should this matter be treated? I want to know how to handle this when my child reaches this stage."

Your uncle's child has been properly trained. He could very easily be spoiled by insisting that he take money for errands. He very soon would get into the habit of expecting pay and this result is not desirable. One form of rewarding a child who is obedient is to show a friendly attitude toward him, for example, by talking to him about something in which he naturally is interested or by playing with him. And this is not only an approved form of reward from a moral standpoint, but it is also an effective reward from the standpoint of discipline. The child appreciates it even more if anything and he will be inclined to obey you in the future, not with any idea of any self-reward in mind but because he likes you. After the habit of willing obedience is well established; when your boy is a little older and you wish him to do some prolonged task, there probably would be no harm in announcing beforehand that you would employ him to do the work at the same rate that you would have to pay an outsider. But for doing simple errands requiring only few minutes' time, material rewards should not be given. Of course, there is one way of giving even material rewards without ill-effect and that is to give them without any apparent connection between them and the errand. Plenty of time must elapse either before or after an errand and there must be no verbal suggestion which would connect the errand with the reward in the child's mind. For example, a ten-year-old boy was called from play to go to a grocery. There was a strong temptation to give him a dime or an old ball or something immediately upon his return, but instead, a friendly, "Thank you ever so much, George," was accorded him. He naturally said, "That's all right," in a friendly way. The next day, he was called again, and instead of being asked to run an errand he was given a half-worn tennis ball and five minutes of the adult's time in playing "catch." This procedure brought practically ideal results. The child created confidence, increased friendship between the two and on the basis of this, many errands were run afterwards in the best spirit possible with no thought of reward for any particular act. Always use methods which appeal to the higher instincts in your child.

Elizabethville Red Cross in New Home Gathers 1,500 Pounds of Clothing Elizabethville, Pa., Oct. 2.—Last Saturday was a great day for this borough. It had been set apart by the local Red Cross auxiliary as the time for the gathering of clothing for the destitute and stricken people of war-ravaged Belgium. Although this community has always gone "over the top" in every drive and campaign launched since the beginning of the war, it never, perhaps, before manifested such a generous and unselfish spirit as evinced on this day. It is estimated that at least 1,500 pounds of clothing and bedding were received at the new Red Cross headquarters which are now located in the spacious store room of Mrs. J. R. Stump on the corner of Main and Market streets. The local Troop, No. 1, of the Boy Scouts of America, were busy during the entire day collecting these useful articles. The pleasing feature is the fact that all the garments given can be used. The large piles of men's overcoats, women's heavy coats and children's garments will gladden the hearts of many of these needy people. The amount of woolen caps, sweaters, shoes and bedding was also large. Large amounts of rubber and peach skins were also collected. Hence it was a great day for this place, for its citizens have again demonstrated their true American spirit and proved themselves to be 100 per cent. patriots.
