Abraham's slow pilgrimage to the land of his vision.

When A Man Hears Voices

Abraham heard a voice. Joan of the attention of the world. We are more interested in Voices inner calls to higher duty, than we once were. Is the basilica that has been built over the scene of the vision of the Maid of Orleans there is a series of wonderful pictures. After the war, I hope, the enthusiasm of the American soldiers who have seen these great paintings will result in the world-wide circulation of reproductions in color.

Most notable of all is the portrayal of Joan, the peasant girl with radiant face, to whom the angels have appeared. Behind her is the very landscape that one sees through the door of the church. On the highway ride a knight and his lady; and a group of village merry-makers are dancing about a tree; while another company sit on the grass and gossip. All are as unconscious of the vision of the maid as, the sheep or the gen-group of village merry-makers are dancing about a tree; while another company sit on the grass and gossip. All are as unconscious of the vision of the maid as, the sheep or the gentle white cow by her side. They in their commonplaceness, with unanointed eyes, saw naught of the great revelation that marked a turning point in the destiny of France. This obedience to the heavenly vision and voices is the mark of spiritual greatness. It is the saving sense of nations and of individuals. It made Abraham all that he became. For it is not the naturally equipped who become greatest in God's service, but the fully surrendered and the instantly obedient. The ready car is the first mark of discipleship, to the Divine. "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth" is the motto for all who would be chosen by God. With the world today in an uproar of jangling voices, there is greatest need for those who will listen open-souled to the Spirit. There are those who discern in the drift of our war-taught times a new tendency toward stressing the religion of the inner light; of the direct word of God to the individual. As nobody else heard Joan of Arc's voices, so only himself heard God's word to Abraham, calling him to a great renunciation, a great removal and a great reward. "I will bless thee..., and thou shalt be a blessing." Is it not fair interpretation of history to say that Abraham, who went out from Mesopotamia and later out of Canaan into Egypt, is returning thither in the spirit of the Christian allites to whom the promise to him has been fulfilled through Christ, and who are bearing a blessing to the broken and oppressed and suffering in the region which Abraham knew as Canaan? New vistas of meaning open up in the phrase, "In thee shall all families of earth be blessed."

With sympathetic hearts the world reads afresh the story of Abraham's separation from home and old associations and kindred and friends. Love, blind, instinctive, unreasoning love, wants its dear ones near; that first of all, How often Abraham's friends talk after this parting; which, in its way, was not unlike the millions of farewells that have been spoken in the past year, as precious sons and brothers and sweethearts and husbands have set out for strange lands, not knowing whither,

This was a transformation experience, even as it is for our soldier boys. It nade a new man of him, as well as marked a new era for the world, Who can measures the consequences of the going-forth experiences of the young men, who, had they not heard the voice of Country and God calling them, would have plodded on in the old semmonplace way? These "come-outers" are like Abraham, making all things new for mankind, Every change of the old order works hardships; but it also marks the onward mevement of menkind. Every change of the old order works hardships; but it also marks the onward mevement of menkind, Abraham gave up much, but he got more; there is always a sort of divine mathematics about surrender to God.

Even so a few years age it would have seemed incredible that the later fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham should engage the attention of the British government, That very wonder has come to pass within recent weeks. In a new, strange, vital sense the Premised Land of Abraham has become a Land of Promise, arresting the whole world's attention, Today the British figs flies yer in birthplace and the grave of Abraham. Before the quarter's lessons are ended, may we not hope that the flag will have completed the same route as the patriarch followed, thus bringing further deliverance to the Jews, Armenians, Assyrians and other Christians in that romantic section of Turkey? Wherever the British flag flies, there is to be found succor and safety for the poorest and the weakest. Side by side with it, to-day, in the Holy City, flies the British flag flies, there is to be found succor and safety for the poorest and the weakest. Side by side with it, to-day, in the Holy City, flies the American flag, as the two notions co-operate in a mission of mercy that wonderfully fullfills one of
