U. S. MILITARY DEPOT AT MARSH RUN COMPLETE

Only Few Details Remain Unfinished at Big Supply Depot

The present practically completed state of the huge United States quartermaster's Interior Depot at New Cumberland after six months or more of strenuous and unremitting work witnesses the changing of its name to that of the United States Army Reserve Depot an announcement to that effect being made to-day by the authorities there.

That part of the government plant yet to be completed are the soldiers' barracks of which there will be twelve in number. A few of these still remain unfinished.

of November will see the last bit of constructive labor on the place it is expected. About 500 soldiers, divided equally between white and negro troops, are quartered on the ground there already with, of course, hundreds more to follow.

The influenza epidemic which exacted a fatal toll of sixteen lives among the soldiers since its outbreak in the depot, is decidedly on the wane according to attaches of the hospital there. Though there are still approximately 200 cases of the disease in the hospital now, these are admittedly convalescent and improvement in their condition is steady.

Major Morava left the depot some time ago to supervise the new government work being done at May's Landing, N. J., while Captain Owens, who for about a similar length of time, has been supervising work at Augusta, Ga., has returned to New Cumberland to see that the work ends well.
