Advice to the Lovelorn

Little Talks by Beatrice Fairfax

What are the arts that widows mploy to charm men? How is it that a bachelor can resist the spring-like smiles and the dimpled innocence of a thousand ingenues, only to surrender unconditionally to the first light, beckening glance from the widow chosen him?

It may be that there exists some sceptic, ignorant of the world of love and lovers, who will deny that choice. But all the testimony of all the ages is to the contrary. And in this respect, at least, I think that men-and widows-haven't changed.

It's only a few days, ago that a letter came to me from a young plexed." And her situation is truly one that warrants perplexity. After explaining that she is twenty years weeks after their marriage, she weeks after their marriage, she writes:

"I am now deeply in love with four men. One is two years my senior, the next is twenty years my senior, the third is one year my junior, and the last is fourteen years older than I. They all have asked me to marry them. The first is an accountant, the next is a banker, the third a soldier and the last a manufacturer.

"Will you please advise me what to do?"

Now there is no way of knowing what bewitchments this young woman exercises, in addition to being a widow. She may be more beautiful than Helen of Troy, her charm may be no less intoxicating than Cleopatra's. But I don't for a moment believe this. I think of her as a sweet, good looking girl who has simply the enormous advantage of understanding men better than unmarried Eighteen who who has simply the enormous advantage of understanding men better than unmarried Eighteen who lives next door to her.

So that because of this important difference between them. Unmarried Eighteen, who may have a much lovelier face and a more sparkling intelligence, is not likely ever to have to consider the proposals of more than one sultor at a time while Widowed Twenty, with four patient, faithful lovers, standing in a row, so to speak, outside her door, has merely to decide on the one that suits her best.

It doesn't seem fair. If married girls feel jealousy of widows. I think they are to be forgiven. One isn't, or one shouldn't be, jealous of wit or beauty or goodness in other girls. Their advantage is natural and legitimate. When nature has been lavishly generous to a girl, it is a matter of course that men should pay her tribute. But to be loved, and loved by multitudes, just because one has already been married doesn't seem reasonable. There's something mysterious about it that one resents a little.

Men's Own Testimony

In order to get as nearly as possible to the heart of this mystery, I have consulted, not widows themselves, who mightn't know or mightn't tell me, but men, the bewitched and captive.

And so far as they can explain their own bewitchment, the truth seems to be that men first seek the company of widows, that is, of reasonably attractive ones, because they feel more comfortable and at ease with them than with unmarried girls.

In spite of all the warnings that have been shouted to the four corners of the earth about these see ease with them than with unmarried girls.

In spite of all the warnings that have been shouted to the four corners of the earth about these seductive creatures, men actually fly to them with a sense of seeking safety, and recklessly drop all their defense on the way. This of course, seems very puzzling.

You see, normal men need the society of women. Usually, they know that they need it. But they are not always willing to appear in the character of a suitor or possible husband, and they suspect all unmarried girls of looking at men in that light.

But a widow!—here, at least, they that light.

But a widow!—here, at least, they say to themselves, is a woman who isn't husband-hunting. She's had her husband. She's safe. So, being completely off their guard, they stumble into love a hundred times more quickly and more desperately than if a young, untried girl had inspired the emotion. But not all men who court widows show this headlong blindness.

Some approach the siren deliberately, knowing quite well what they are about—not that they always expect to be ensured.

"A widow is like a delicately opened, fragrant flower," one lover explained. "A mere bud hasn't any fragrance, just as a young girl can't have any fascination."

But those who expect merely to smiff this metaphorical perfume and go on their way usually find that it goes to their heads and that they become infatuated lovers before they are even aware of having chosen their inamorata. Or so men say of each other. I don't know that the mystery we started with is hereby explained.

There's one wooer of the widow,
