

215 CAPTURED YANKS BACK IN AMERICAN LINES

Can't Forget "Dan Patch"
Stew; Bits of Choice
Horseflesh

With the First American Army in France, Nov. 21.—Two hundred and fifteen American soldiers who had been held prisoners of war by the Germans were brought into the town of Revigny yesterday.

"You ought to have heard us give them Hellies the old raspberry when we left up yonder," said Sergeant Walter Sampson, of Chicago, who was one of two men left of his platoon of Company E, 138th Infantry, after a charge.

"They had us at Montmedy first," said Sampson, "but our bombers came over and bombed the town of the place, so we went on strike and refused to work around a railroad that bombers were aiming at. Then they took us to Corey. That's where we were when the fighting stopped."

"We knew the finish was in sight because the German privates kept telling us what was going on outside. Every day they'd be around saying the war was going to end next day, they were tickled to death about it, too."

"There was one mean Prussian sergeant—a little short guy—who was always yelling at us, 'Raus Amerikaner, and we started a song for his benefit."

"I wish I had that son of a gun at the end of a bayonet right now," interrupted Fred Sona, of New York, who was with the 118th Infantry.

"He was certainly mean."

"They didn't have much to eat themselves, then Dutchmen didn't," said John Powell, of Campbellsville, Ohio, the only man from the First Division in the party which represented about fifteen American divisions which were on the line of the Argonne-Meuse drive.

"I'm going to dream about 'Dan Patch' stew and barley soup as long as I live. Dan Patch stew is horse flesh," he explained. "It was meat from horses that had been killed in battle. You could see how it had been torn by shells."

"They treated us better than they treated the Russian or French," said Sergeant Herbert Birchard, of Omaha, who was a member of the 89th Division. "They had about 1,000 Russians there. They booted them around pretty fierce all the time."

even though Russia was supposed to be at peace with them."

"How was I captured?" Birchard grinned. "Well, I strayed over into the German lines one night. I saw a lot of guys laying on the ground sleeping, and I thought they were our own men; so I went around shaking them and telling them to wake up. Finally I heard one guy say 'Vot iss?' The next thing I knew about forty Dutchmen were around me."

"Those Russians certainly got a rough deal," said Corporal E. Farrot, of Richmond, Va., from the 118th Infantry. "When we refused to work around the railroad where the bombers were dropping explosives the French prisoners also struck, so the Russians had to do all the work there. They worked us on the roads, and when they did work us they paid us six cents a day."

Several requests have come from other cities for information regarding steps to be taken to merge.
