"Anne, dear, I snatched the 'phone from Vee because I wanted to hear from the bride herself, how our Jimmie is getting on," said Betty in her clear vibrative vibrative clear vibrating voice. clear vibrating voice.

But even while I was assuring her that Jim was almost as well as he thought himself, my lips were trembling with the hurt of Virginia's snub and the clever twist Betty had given to facts in order to save me from being hurt.

"You'll come to see Jim to-morrow, won't you, Betty?" I asked hopefully, "I'd like a chat with you, myself."

"Maybe I'll run in and take you out for a breath of air while Virginia is visiting with Jim," suggested Betty.

Then we said good-by, and I set my face into a smile before I turned to face my boy. But there wasn't a smile in my heart—for in the very way Betty was standing between Virginia and me, I recognized the intimacy and understanding between them.

"Which shall we move, Jim—your throne or the table?" I asked in a voice I hoped was light and casual, "Neal and I will give Jimmie a ride," laughed Phoebe, answering for him. "Say, Anne, vou're lucky that you didn't get to speak with Vec. My, 'wasn't she peeved because I didn't phone home the tidings that iddn't phone home the tidings that iddn't phone home the tidings that it would." AN UNHAPPY GIRL-WIFE
DEAR MISS FAIRFAX:
I am 19 and married and have a child. But I am not happy as others are. Since the day I married life has gone wrong with me. My husband hever takes me out, and he hardly ever works, and I am tired of him. What made me marry young was that my parents insisted. Everybody says I'm nice and I could have a good chance in life yet. Please advise me what to do.

A CONSTANT READER.
You are very young, my poor child, to be facing these problems and responsibilities. There should certainly be a limit of endurance in a wife dealings with her husband, but I urge you not to be hasty in assuming that yours cannot mend his ways. Since you cannot at present depend on him for companionship, why not try to build up a life of your own? Reach out for many friends and as many interests as possible. Perhaps this will make your respect and he will therefore change his course.
