Chapter Lixixii

When I arrived at the Clinsarge restaurant and found Pat Dalton waiting in the tiny foyer, I discovered that we had the place almost to ourselves.

"Handsome Pat" laughed:
"Everyone comes to this little restaurant for dinner — but the world wants jazz bands to put a kick in its tea. So you see, I've put you wise to a wonderful place to come, Mrs. Jimmie—after the honeymoon glanfour wears off."

"It won't wear off," I began in disgust, and then I remembered a recent sermon on fact that Father Andrew had delivered to me—"I'm pretty sure that I'm at least sterling, and I know my boy is pure gold."

"Gold wears better with a little alloy, Mrs. Harrison," laughed Pat Dalton cynically.
"I came to you because I honestly thought you needed help. Do you?" I asked stiffly.
"I need it badly," he began simply—then laughed in his reckless fashion—"and I'm needing a sup of tea—as well."

But when I followed Pat Dalton into the tea room he insisted on drinking cocktails, while I had tea.
"You shouldn't"— I began.
Playfully he shook his finger at himself.
"Bad boy, Pat—all the ladies lec-ing through your reserve—to help me about Phoebe and Neal, They are only—good friends."

"All right — if that's what you want me to think. But don't let Evelyn Mason get her claws into the boy—she'll scratch deep. I know." Something in his voice made me wonder if Virginia's hatred of Evvy was all on Jim's account, Had Evvy Mason any part in Virginia's estrangement from Pat Dalton—had Pat Dalton any part in the broken engagement that had taken my Jim from Evvy and saved him for me." Pat Dalton's voice cut across my thoughts with the curt suddenness of a whiplash:

"Mrs. Jimmie, I'm no altruist—I didn't bring you here just to tell you about Evvy."

"I can guess that," I replied, smiling, with a sudden feeling of liking for this man who was twisting and warping the thread of his life so miserably that even I could see some of the knots and breaks.
"I want to know if Jim feels friendly enough to see me now and then. I've always kept up with him. I'd like to see a bit of him."

"Tve never heard Jim say a word against you, Mr. Dalton. But do you think, in loyalty—to Virginia, he could be—friends with you?"

At last the forbidden word had been spoken. Virginia's name lay between us like a challenge. Pat Dalton took his nervous fingers from the stem of his glass and laid them flat on the table before him.
For a moment he sat with downcast lids staring at them. Then he looked out on the avenue. His blue eyes roved everywhere but toward my face.

"Virginia," he said. "Mrs. Jimmie, what does she say about me?"

I gasped. I wanted to soften the truth. But there was no way.

"She has never spoken of you to me," I replied.

"Jeanie never mentions me? Jeanie—well, I might have known that she wouldn't. Have an ice, Mrs. Jimmie? Really not? All right then—check, please."

And my tea with Pat Dalton was over.

Gravely at the door he put mento a taxicab, and stood with gray head uncovered until we had rolled far down the street ,and I couldn't make out his figure any longer through the little window at the back of the cab.

With an air of finality he went out of my life. But I know that I've not done with Pat Dalton. And wonder if Virginia is finished with

Lax Divorce Laws Scored by Judges

Atlanta, Ga.—Going strong to the end of the year, Atlanta's record for divorces in 1918 is nearing 1,000 and is now 200 more than the number disunited in 1917. Several court judges have scored the lax laws making separations easy in Georgia, demanding stricter laws covering divorce.

if he does anything with them at all.

Next, bring the child in and appear to be very happy and enthusiastic. Exaggerate your motions as you reach down and pick up a paper or two and lay them neatly on the chair. Have this chair near enough to the one on which you are sitting that in case the child should make the least move toward the paper on the chair, you could give him a little shock by saying quickly, "No, no!" and even taking hold of the offending hand and putting it down with emphasis if necessary to keep him from touching the papers which on the floor again and suggest that you are anxious to see him pick them up. Then approve him lavighty. In this way you substitute a good habit for the bad.

The common tendency on the part of most parents in dealing with a similar case is, to continually put enhigh and other things out of the child's reach. This method has the effect of driving deeper in the child's mind the suggestion that he is bad about throwing things and as a result of the them up.

to the matter and use proper methods.

To illustrate, let us take a very simple case. A father writes to me:

"Will you kindly suggest measures required in the following case? Boy—age two years. Has habit of throwing papers and other articles from chair or table. No amount of coaxing or punishment will insiduce him to pick them up. He always puts his toys away where they belong but takes special delight in throwing papers on the floor and refusing to pick them up. There certainly is a remedy, but we have failed to find it."

Give your two-year-old son a special lesson on the point of picking up papers. Put a chair near the floor around the chair. Have no papers at all on the chair near the floor around the chair. Have no papers at all on the chair or table so that all the child can do is to pick up the papers off the floor if he does anything with them at all.

Next, bring the child in and ap-

Blister—Easier, Quicker

There's no sense in mixing a mess of mustard, flour and water when you can easily relieve pain, soreness or stiffness with a little clean, white Musterole.

Musterole is made of pure oil of mustard and other helpful ingredients, combined in the form of the present white ointment. It takes the place of mustard plasters, and will not blister.

Musterole usually gives prompt relief from sore throat, bronchitis, tonsilitis, croup, stiff neck, asthma, neuralgia, headache, congestion, pleurisy, rheumatism, lumbago, pains and aches of the back or joints, sprains, sore muscles, bruises, chilblains, frosted feet, colds of the chest (it often prevents pneumonia).

Children very easily fall into habits once started are always hard to break. It is obvious, then, that we should be continually on guard against the beginning of habits that are not desirable.

But even habits already started can be changed in a comparatived short time if we pay special attention to the matter and use proper methods.
