first urged upon the public, people laughed and quoted,

He baited his hook with tigers' tails and sat on a rock and fished for whales.

Whale meat is purchasable, but where is the steward or chef brave enough to place it on a hotel menu?

As a matter of fact, there is nothing in the slightest degree objectionable to eye, nose, or palate in whale steak, as those unprejudiced may quickly learn. It resembles corned beef in appearance, tastes like fresh beef—possibly a little less so, and broiled and served with a sauce, either drawn butter or a lemon sauce, is tasty enough for a second helping, once we have overcome our dread of the untried. That this meat will eventually be recognized as a food adjunct is indicated by two large canneries doing a good business on the Pacific Coast and the concessions granted to the syndicate supplying them.

The fish of the shark is said to resemble that of the sturgeon—the fish that "goes to the Caesar's dish," but its cannibalistic reputation, firmly fixed in the popular mind, is against it. Man's dread of the gastronomically untried is only equalled by his curiosity, which, after all, sets the better of his fears. Truly, he was a brave man who first swallowed a rawyster.

Prejudice plays a large part in our food purchases. Take the case of Butter vs. Oleomargarine. Experts in the former have been known to fail in ability to distinguish the two, yet we are willing to pay 20 per cent more for butter than for the substitute. The prejudice against goods from storage helps bolster the cost of living. Were it not for storage facilities butter and eggs to-day would be luxuries for the very rich only. The public was recently reliably informed that storage eggs had proved fresher than fresh eggs. The rabbit would furnish food as well as fur if our "don't like" did not stand in the way. As a matter of fact, our "can't eat" and "don't like" are mainly psychological states fixed in habit and prejudice.—Detroit Free Press.
