Did the Earth Give Birth to Meteorites?

By Garrett P. Serviss

"Is it not possible for nature to have such power or force as to throw parts of our earth into space so high that they may never, or hardly ever return to the earth again?"

The idea that meteorites are ancient children of earth, gathered together, like De Quincey's revolted Tartars, from their wanderings in the wilds of space, is a theory that is old of their forgoing shepherd."

It is possible that the volcanic energies of the earth may have once produced a velocity that would have thrown dust to heights of as much as 100 miles.

One of the strongest reasons for supposing meteorites to have originated in volcanoes is that they bear much resemblance in composition and physical state, to minerals known to have been ejected from volcanoes.

It is not necessary to point out how strikingly all these things accord with the hypothesis that the meteorites originated in some great body of the earth, which was broken up, and yet again, and yet again, during their plunge through the atmosphere the violent disruptions resembling explosions, but it is usual to clear the way of irregular shape to begin with.

In contradiction to the theory of the earth's origin, meteorites, it has been shown that they have been shot out of the giant volcanoes of the moon in long past ages, but there are some very serious difficulties in the way of this hypothesis.

As the Poles refused to recognize the Bolsheviks the men were ordered that they should return to Moscow as the relief work already was being done.
