MAKING THE MOST OF OUR CHILDREN

A Series of Plain Talks to Parents

By Ray C. Beery, A.B., M.A., President of the Parents Association.

Not all child training problems can be solved by dealing with the child alone.

Sometimes a constant cause of trouble is found in the methods of certain adult relatives who never have acquired the fine habit of attending strictly to their own business.

When we happen to be fortunate enough to determine the exact cause of trouble, we should strive to remove that cause, no matter what the chances be.

Some mothers told me they hesitated to speak to their relatives, lest they become offended. But the subject can be talked over in a most friendly way and without hurting anyone's feeling in the least.

Let us take a typical case. One mother writes to me: "I have a 'Grandparent Problem.' My husband's parents who idolize my five-year-old son. There isn't a thing under Heaven, reasonable or unreasonable, that they won't give him if he only wants it. They try in every way to shield him from punishment and whenever he wants anything he runs to them, even after I have refused. This is provoking. He now will hardly pay any attention to what I say. I want your help."

The grandparents of your five-year-old son seem to have succeeded in spoiling him. Some relatives seem to be especially adept at this.

But it really is a serious matter and if I were you I would deal directly with the grandparents. Go and have a talk with the one who seems to be the principal offender. If it is the grandmother, tell her you want to ask a friendly favor of her. Tell her that you believe your five-year-old son is old enough to be taught to obey.

Continue somewhat like this: "I think one mistake I have made in the past is to tell him to do something and then let him get off without doing it, which naturally encouraged him in the habit of disobeying. What I should have done was to give a command only when I really needed to have him do something and then insist that he must do it. If I had made this a perfectly proper attitude, so I want to start in now and carry out this rule, so that whenever I give him a command, he must carry it out. You will help me to teach him, won't you?"

By admitting your own mistake and not finding fault with her, you do not antagonize the grandparent, and since you put up a request in a friendly way and ask only what sounds perfectly just, she may at last judge her co-operation and help you.

Do not allow her to take your request in an unfriendly way. Be kind and proper attitude and she very probably will respond favorably. Of course, if she should be unreasonable after you have given more than half your time and cooperation, do not say anything to her; simply leave her with a slight smile to show that you have perfectly self-control and do not allow your son to visit her at all.

Build up in your son a greater love and respect for you. This can be done through play. While under your supervision, give him orders in executing various little orders for you which will promote his play. He thus will learn to love you more as a result of this companionship and at the same time his obedience of your orders will become a habit.

Life's Problems Are Discussed

By MRS WILSON WOODROW.

What is the next thing you are going to do?

Everybody has some pet plan or purpose in view, some project or ambition he has long cherished, but which for one reason or another he has never been able to carry out.

To take an illustration from the most familiar, I have never yet known an author who did not have an especial story which he wanted to write, which he fully intended some time to write, and yet which somehow never gets written. And I suppose, the same rule holds in every other vocation—with the inventor and the musician, the artist, the salesman, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the farmer and the financier.

And the reason is that every one of us fritters away his time. We are as prodigal with our minutes and even our half-hours as we used to be in the old wasteful, pre-Hoover days with our sugar and our flour.

Now time, as we all learned from our copy-books, is money. But it is more than that—wisely used, it is reputation, success, the very pinnacle of achievement. It is man's most valuable asset, and the one he usually values least, until he sees it running low. Think what it might have meant to the science of aviation if a few more years had been granted to Wilbur Wright, to American literature if Jack London and O. Henry had staid with us a little longer. Think what it would have meant to human progress if Abraham Lincoln had lived through another decade.

Yet we all squander time as recklessly as the proverbial drunken sailor does his pay. We allow ourselves to be drawn off constantly into side issues of the most doubtful advantage to ourselves if any. We permit ourselves to be imposed on by time sponges and deadbeats, and lack the nerve to call a halt on it.

The most important person in the world to each of us is himself, and the one whose claims should be first considered. I don't mean by that to uphold selfishness or a lack of public spirit. One owes something both to his neighbor and to the community in which he lives. But one has a right to resent being robbed.

In a great emergency, such as we have just passed through, and where so many were freely offering their lives, it was not too much to ask that one should give all, both of time and of substance. But we are returning now to normal conditions, and in view of the great emergency of war, the amount of work to be done, it stands us all in hand to take stock of what we have and make careful provision.

What, then, of the great asset, Time? We have seen how by a concerted effort of the whole people to restrict waste in just a few staples vast tons of those commodities have been saved, and that, too, without actual hardship to anybody. Imagine then the years and centuries and ages of wasted time that could be saved if a similar effort were applied in that direction.

And that does not mean any diminution of pleasures. We give up to amusement and relaxation and seeing our friends and the calls of charity or public service and the pursuit of our various hobbies. As a matter of fact, we should probably have more leisure for all those things. It simply means we should do with our time as the housewives did with food, and keep an eye on the garbage pail.

This is an era of budgets. The favorite indoor sport this winter, I understand, is to gather around the family lamp with pencil and paper and fund the family income. Every magazine one picks up has a half dozen or more advertisements of various systems to promote domestic economy. The old drama, the High Cost of Living, is being assailed on every side by valiant St. Georges armed with carefully ruled columns and methodically entered figures.

If it's a good plan to budget one's

Advice to the Lovelorn

ASKING FATHER

Dear Miss Fairfax:

I am eighteen and have been going about with a young man four years my senior for three months. He asked me several times to marry him, but I have always refused for the simple reason that he has not as yet asked my father's permission, and also that I think I have plenty of time in which to get married. Now, Miss Fairfax, my family are all against him for no special reason and have repeatedly told me, though they have not yet demanded that I give him up. I know you will tell me to talk it over with my parents, but I have done so over and over again, but to no avail. When I asked my friend when he is going to ask my father he always tells me that he will the first chance he gets, but he always seems to put it off. G. R.

Why don't you try to give your family a better opinion of this young man before you insist on the momentous interview? Surely you wish him to be received favorably. Or are you so little in love with him that you are indifferent as to his success with your parents?

THE TOBACCO PROBLEM

Dear Miss Fairfax:

I am going about with a young man whom I have grown to regard as more than a friend. The only thing that I do not like about him is that he smokes a great many cigars. I have asked him to stop smoking, and we have many arguments. Do you think I am right in asking him to stop?

A CONSTANT READER.

It is a reasonable thing to ask and it will be greatly to the young man's advantage if he gives up smoking for your sake. I wish that all young men who smoke excessively could be persuaded to make this sacrifice.

To buy Robert's Suits but my good neighbor Mrs. Smith told me that I could save several dollars on Boys' Suits and Overcoats at Doutrichs Clearance Sale, so I went there and found just what I wanted, then bought quite a few other things with what I saved from the former price of the Suit.
