

The Private Life of the Kaiser

FROM THE PAPERS AND DIARIES OF THE BARONESS VON LARISCH-REDDERN The Kaiser and Kaiserin's Late Major Domo, Chief of the Royal Household at Berlin and Potsdam.

Baroness von Larisch-Reddern is the TRUE name of the Berlin Court Lady who gave the story of the Kaiser to Henry William Fisher, Ursula, Countess von Eppinghoven being a nom de guerre, heretofore used to shield her.

Decollette Tik and Dresses—When Kaiser Wondered Where the Crown Prince, When a Little Boy, Got His Nasty Tongue From—How the Kaiser Shocked Poor "Nicky"—Organized Imperial Shams—Swinish Table Manners of Courtiers—A New York Periodical Shocks Kaiser and Comes Near Causing the Sack to a Royal Minister—How the Song-of-Aegis Fraud Was Perpetrated—How a German Prince Demanded Himself Before the Kaiser—As a Strategist, the Kaiser Was a Joke—Fraudulent Stories Regarding Kaiser's "Ceaseless" Activities "For the Public Good"—He Worked Very Hard Enjoying Himself Instead—Employed Artists to do the "Works of Art" For Which He Claimed Credit—When the Kaiser Tried to Rival Caruso—Official Press Lies About Kaiser—Kaiser's Speeches Full of Plattitudes and Ignorant Misquotations

What is German "Kultur"? Is William Hohenzollern a "genius" or a "charlatan"? This startling exposure by the chief of the Imperial Household or Court proves for all time that German "Kultur" is a colossal fraud which was imposed upon the world by the Kaiser and his unscrupulous clique. According to this intimate of the Kaiser and Kaiserin, so-called German "Kultur" is a "wolf masquerading in the scholar's cloak." It is a veneer which covers the coarsest grain of brutality, ribaldry and vulgarity. This expose will give our reader an insight into the instincts which caused savage attacks on tens of thousands of women and children in Belgium and France during the Great War. It is a true exposé of this world myth called "Kultur," which found its outlet in gross barbarity and a reversion to savagery.

[Continued from Yesterday.] Truth About the Hohenzollerns I have no personal end in view with these revelations; no excuses are offered for this narrative of Court life in Germany as I have seen it, other than to give the world the truth about the Hohenzollerns. If in part it borders on the unexpected, by upsetting established notions, and again explains certain things which have hitherto been from a standpoint totally different from the one popularly accepted and believed, let the reader remember that truth is stranger than fiction, and that history is but a lie, to borrow a phrase from the Duchess of Orleans, the sister-in-law of Louis XV, who exclaimed, on hearing the false report that Frederick the Great was marching upon Versailles after Rossbach: "So much the better, I shall at last see a King."

A lady of title and position, after losing my fortune, accepted their Majesties' command to join the retinue already noted for high-sounding names, and by royal warrant was appointed chief of the Imperial Household, or Lady Major Domo. For many years I was what the first gentleman of Europe cleverly characterized "a maid aiding the angler of a busy party in a royal box at the play, one that goes to the theater to concerts, and oratorical feats, and has physicians without fees and medicine without druggists' history."

As Maitresse de Maison I had a ticklish post, that bound me closely to their Majesties' heels, inasmuch as the care of the "all-high" persons was given into my hands. Can it be that I have mistaken the character of the personage upon whom the eyes of the whole world are now riveted, and who is likely to engage the most lively attention at the forthcoming trial? William's Sister Calls Him "A Charlatan"

The German Court from the day I entered it was and always has been vulgar, coarse, and as I shall later prove—depraved. It had no semblance of "altim" it was in fact ignorant, superficial and "behind the scenes," most disgusting. The Kaiser is neither a reader nor a student, but a mere pretender to knowledge. After a quarrel with William, the Princess of Meiningen once called her big brother "the great charlatan" and his cronies the "little ones" whom he continuously out-tricks.

Those Risque Stories Love of risque stories is a Hohenzollern falling contemporary writers agree that Frederick the Great shunned woman's society because it obliged him to bridle his tongue and observe the ordinary decencies of life; the "romantic" Frederick William IV was a trafficker in classics and modern pornographic literature, and the present Kaiser's grossness of How Many of Your Neighbors Drink POSTUM You know of some, but why do they drink it? It's because coffee disagrees with them. Next time a wakeful night or nervousness, heart-flutter or stomach disturbance follows coffee-drinking Think of Postum "There's a Reason"

Imperial Shams The head of the nation, whose "unceasing industry" was the talk of the Continent, vainly trying to kill time with buffoonery; the sovereign lady, "mother of the poor," working per day in a gown the cost of which would keep for ten years the poor boy or girl for whom the knitted thing is intended, and assume the little one a splendid education. It was a saying at Court: "Give the Kaiser an up-to-date rendering of the Merry Jests of King Louis XI, and you will receive a standing invitation to accompany him on his Northland trips; tell him something more delicate than the "Tattle of the Nuns of Poissy," and he will book you for an ambassadorship," and that is no exaggeration, as will be seen in what I shall later reveal about William's boon companions and their scandalous escapades. The Kaiser's inclination for the ludicrous even intruded itself into "business of state": for, as he considered his mind, but royal servants of high degree, so were Court functions regarded by him as quasi affairs of government.

Always Eager For Amusement The "house" regulations provided that a list of invited persons be presented to the Empress and her ladies early every morning, so that they could dress accordingly. My experience showed that one's second-best bib and tucker at table, whether the bulletin announced a brace of nobodies or half a dozen ministers and ambassadors, for at the last moment His Majesty might bring in the Chancellor, some sovereign or prince traveling incognito, or a whole host of fine-looking young officers whom he came across on one of his rides or outings, or who happened to report at the palace about meal-time. His habit of issuing these invitations, however, did not necessarily imply that William was a hospitable man; maybe he did not care a snap of his fingers for the individuals

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

dragged to the gilded chair of ennui by all-highest command; he invited these gentlemen merely because they promised diversion, either by reason of their personality, or by information or gossip in their possession—anything to escape the monotony of daily surroundings, was the Kaiser's continuous prayer. If his wife and her ladies were embarrassed, so much the worse for them. "Three weeks' table duty suffice to ruin any one's digestion," was a saying at Court, and, it might be added, was enough to spoil one's savoy-vire too. In the fashionable restaurant at the Hotel de Rome, in Berlin a little old man was pointed out to me by a friend from the provinces, "I am astonished," said my friend, "that they allow so ill-mannered a person in this place." Swinish Courtiers "You mean the white-haired and beribboned gentlemen in the corner?" "Really! And who swings his tooth-pick so furiously?" "Why, it is Count —, chamberlain to the Empress." "Really! And who may be the gentleman with him who combs his mustache with chop whiskers over his soup-plate?" "That is Minister von Puttkamer." "But they behave like pigs. Do they learn that at the royal table?" "Nonsense; in the presence of their Majesties they are under such awful restraint, that, bit duty, they let themselves loose, like boys escaped from boarding-school drink out of their saucers and wipe their mouths on their sleeves." More Table Manners The guests and attendants at table are in gala or demi toilet, most of the younger officers being as tightly corseted as the ladies, while all the men wear the narrowest of uniforms, that scarcely allow them to breathe. Add to this feeling of physical distress the overpowering anxiety of preparing for the supreme moment when the Kaiser or the Kaiserin shall address one of them, or give the signal for laughter, and it will be obvious at once that taking potluck with Prussia's royalty had its drawbacks. But the most miserable person of the glittering assemblage was she who wears the costliest gown, the biggest diamonds. At meal-time the Kaiser choose to make a display of his conversational powers or wit and Augustus, who knew only one, and that she cannot rival the one, and that the other is out of her reach. So she sat quietly, addressing little nothings to her ladies in an undertone from time to time, who, painfully alert, that none of His Majesty's jokes and innuendoes escaped her. William seldom spoke to his wife around smoking cigarettes and telling stories and listening to tales of interesting personages of the Court and society here and abroad. And while this lascivious tattle was carried on, Her Majesty lounged negligently gowned, knitting, dipping little woolen caps for orphan asylums, and talking religion and cheap charity schemes. What contrasts! What dissimulation! I often thought to myself when, being in attendance upon Her Majesty, the echo of sneering allusions to a friend's acquaintance's wife or daughter wafted just me through the door of the billiard-room, ajar by some lackey with his tablet, or opened by the Kaiserin's order that she might feast her eyes on the husband she loved so well.

Imperial Shams The head of the nation, whose "unceasing industry" was the talk of the Continent, vainly trying to kill time with buffoonery; the sovereign lady, "mother of the poor," working per day in a gown the cost of which would keep for ten years the poor boy or girl for whom the knitted thing is intended, and assume the little one a splendid education. It was a saying at Court: "Give the Kaiser an up-to-date rendering of the Merry Jests of King Louis XI, and you will receive a standing invitation to accompany him on his Northland trips; tell him something more delicate than the "Tattle of the Nuns of Poissy," and he will book you for an ambassadorship," and that is no exaggeration, as will be seen in what I shall later reveal about William's boon companions and their scandalous escapades. The Kaiser's inclination for the ludicrous even intruded itself into "business of state": for, as he considered his mind, but royal servants of high degree, so were Court functions regarded by him as quasi affairs of government. Always Eager For Amusement The "house" regulations provided that a list of invited persons be presented to the Empress and her ladies early every morning, so that they could dress accordingly. My experience showed that one's second-best bib and tucker at table, whether the bulletin announced a brace of nobodies or half a dozen ministers and ambassadors, for at the last moment His Majesty might bring in the Chancellor, some sovereign or prince traveling incognito, or a whole host of fine-looking young officers whom he came across on one of his rides or outings, or who happened to report at the palace about meal-time. His habit of issuing these invitations, however, did not necessarily imply that William was a hospitable man; maybe he did not care a snap of his fingers for the individuals

Marshal Joffre Heads Czech Army, Says Germans

MARSHAL JOFFRE. Marshal Joffre, hero of the Marne, and General Pellet, with their respective staffs, have arrived at Prague, Bohemia, according to a dispatch from there. There is a report that Marshal Joffre has been appointed chief of staff of the Czech-Slovak army. The Czech army is reported to be advancing in the direction of Saxony.

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

dragged to the gilded chair of ennui by all-highest command; he invited these gentlemen merely because they promised diversion, either by reason of their personality, or by information or gossip in their possession—anything to escape the monotony of daily surroundings, was the Kaiser's continuous prayer. If his wife and her ladies were embarrassed, so much the worse for them. "Three weeks' table duty suffice to ruin any one's digestion," was a saying at Court, and, it might be added, was enough to spoil one's savoy-vire too. In the fashionable restaurant at the Hotel de Rome, in Berlin a little old man was pointed out to me by a friend from the provinces, "I am astonished," said my friend, "that they allow so ill-mannered a person in this place." Swinish Courtiers "You mean the white-haired and beribboned gentlemen in the corner?" "Really! And who swings his tooth-pick so furiously?" "Why, it is Count —, chamberlain to the Empress." "Really! And who may be the gentleman with him who combs his mustache with chop whiskers over his soup-plate?" "That is Minister von Puttkamer." "But they behave like pigs. Do they learn that at the royal table?" "Nonsense; in the presence of their Majesties they are under such awful restraint, that, bit duty, they let themselves loose, like boys escaped from boarding-school drink out of their saucers and wipe their mouths on their sleeves." More Table Manners The guests and attendants at table are in gala or demi toilet, most of the younger officers being as tightly corseted as the ladies, while all the men wear the narrowest of uniforms, that scarcely allow them to breathe. Add to this feeling of physical distress the overpowering anxiety of preparing for the supreme moment when the Kaiser or the Kaiserin shall address one of them, or give the signal for laughter, and it will be obvious at once that taking potluck with Prussia's royalty had its drawbacks. But the most miserable person of the glittering assemblage was she who wears the costliest gown, the biggest diamonds. At meal-time the Kaiser choose to make a display of his conversational powers or wit and Augustus, who knew only one, and that she cannot rival the one, and that the other is out of her reach. So she sat quietly, addressing little nothings to her ladies in an undertone from time to time, who, painfully alert, that none of His Majesty's jokes and innuendoes escaped her. William seldom spoke to his wife around smoking cigarettes and telling stories and listening to tales of interesting personages of the Court and society here and abroad. And while this lascivious tattle was carried on, Her Majesty lounged negligently gowned, knitting, dipping little woolen caps for orphan asylums, and talking religion and cheap charity schemes. What contrasts! What dissimulation! I often thought to myself when, being in attendance upon Her Majesty, the echo of sneering allusions to a friend's acquaintance's wife or daughter wafted just me through the door of the billiard-room, ajar by some lackey with his tablet, or opened by the Kaiserin's order that she might feast her eyes on the husband she loved so well.

Imperial Shams The head of the nation, whose "unceasing industry" was the talk of the Continent, vainly trying to kill time with buffoonery; the sovereign lady, "mother of the poor," working per day in a gown the cost of which would keep for ten years the poor boy or girl for whom the knitted thing is intended, and assume the little one a splendid education. It was a saying at Court: "Give the Kaiser an up-to-date rendering of the Merry Jests of King Louis XI, and you will receive a standing invitation to accompany him on his Northland trips; tell him something more delicate than the "Tattle of the Nuns of Poissy," and he will book you for an ambassadorship," and that is no exaggeration, as will be seen in what I shall later reveal about William's boon companions and their scandalous escapades. The Kaiser's inclination for the ludicrous even intruded itself into "business of state": for, as he considered his mind, but royal servants of high degree, so were Court functions regarded by him as quasi affairs of government. Always Eager For Amusement The "house" regulations provided that a list of invited persons be presented to the Empress and her ladies early every morning, so that they could dress accordingly. My experience showed that one's second-best bib and tucker at table, whether the bulletin announced a brace of nobodies or half a dozen ministers and ambassadors, for at the last moment His Majesty might bring in the Chancellor, some sovereign or prince traveling incognito, or a whole host of fine-looking young officers whom he came across on one of his rides or outings, or who happened to report at the palace about meal-time. His habit of issuing these invitations, however, did not necessarily imply that William was a hospitable man; maybe he did not care a snap of his fingers for the individuals

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on the table, swinging the other to and fro, while his adjutants and guests entertained him with imitations of music-hall and circus people, small talk, and droll stories of the coarsest grain, reeking with the fumes of the barrack-mess. Forgets His Wife's Existence That in the feverish hunt after amusements and excitement, family life at the German Court, of which the contemporary press made so much, was a delusion and a snare, saying, though, to accuse William of neglecting his Frau, in the ordinary sense of the word, would, perhaps, be unjust, for he kept up appearances in a general way, and I have reasons to believe that he loved his wife. Yet he had a knack of forgetting her very existence whenever he thought he was better off alone

ally, I remember the Kaiser's wrath when in September, 1914, the first reference to his august Majesty, strayed onto his library table. William was surprised out of his boots. "I command the postmaster to send general" he shouted into the phone. And when that dignitary respectfully responded, he demanded to know whether the post office department was asleep. "You had the effrontery to shout that story into my ears through my mails," he bawled, "if that happens again it will mean your resignation." And William hung up the receiver with a bang. Supper at Court was no more entertaining than the midday meal: the same stiff-necked formality, the same strain of the Kaiser's endeavoring to be his own merry Andrew, the rest of the company dull for the most part. As for the Empress, she remained an impassive as ever, smiling in her subdued manner; only her corsage was considerably lower, and she wore an extra handful or two of jewels. An extreme décollette is the Kaiser's avowed motto; but despite allurements of toilet and the assiduity with which her charms were set off, William could not be induced to remain in his wife's presence a minute longer than courtesy demanded. As soon as coffee was served, the Emperor took himself off with his men friends and attendants and as stated, repaired to the billiard-room, where he sat for hours, with one leg on