"When a Girl Marries"

By ANN LISLE

A New, Romantic Serial Dealing With the Absorbing Problems of a Girl Wife

CHAPTER CXXXIX.
(Copyright, 1919, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

"You haven't told me a thing about the new firm," I ventured, under cover of a number when the chorus was cavorting to its own loud song.

"The new firm?" I said smiling in set fashion, even while I was gathering impressions. "I hope you'll always do as well as with Salt Water Oil. Let's celebrate—a good beginning. And we've our Betty safe, again, too."

"Betty?" asked Dick West idly. Jim scowled, either at my ill-concealed becoming curiosity or at the fact that I didn't feel or at what he had to tell.

"Oh, a girl who threw a scare into us. But that's all over now. We aren't going to this show, Annie. Couldn't get a thing at any of the agents. We'll jump a taxi and go round to the Barrington. Dryden said he'd have something there for me."

"But, Jim—that's wasting three seats," I murmured against. And then, Jim could express the annoyance that seemed flashing at me from his eyes. Dick West broke in:

"Go to it!" laughed Jim. "That'll please Phoebe and save Anne from an attack of conscience."

"Well, I'll tell you what's better than phoning," I exclaimed. West with what seemed an effort to appear suddenly inspired, "I'll run round and get her. I've just remembered what she's dining with Miss Mason—the mentioned it last night. So I'll bring the hostess along, and see if I can't pick up another man. See you later, folks."

Hardly waiting for Jim's nod of approval, he hailed a taxi and was whirled away.

"How about the star?" I asked, preening myself pertly and making ready with great delight to flirt with my Jim. "Hifinity, you look as if you might be her granddaughter."

Jim laid his fingers on my shoulder and propelled me to the front of the box. I could feel the reaction of his touch through the chiffon of my dress, and tingled with happiness. But when I reached to take his hand he drew it away quickly and busied himself with his program.

"Want to look like a couple of honey-mooners from the country?" he whispered, with an annoyance that was only partly masked by his smile. His tender mood had passed. But I couldn't readjust myself so rapidly.

THE HEART BREAKER

A REAL AMERICAN LOVE STORY
By VIRGINIA TERRHUNE VAN DE WATER

CHAPTER XLIX.
(Copyright, 1919, Star Company.)
Mildred Brent, never over-conscious, was not hampered by a sense of guilt as she faced her betrothed.

"Well," she said, "what's the matter? I thought you were in Bridgeport."

"Was that why you had Chandler here?" Arthur asked.

"Why, yes—I mean I knew my evening would be spent alone, so I let him come."

"You did not expect me, did you?" he questioned.

Honora, watching the little drama, wondered that the girl did not perceive that the man was under some adverse mental or nervous strain. But Mildred, always secure in her egotism, noted nothing except that Arthur was disagreeably persistent. She did not suspect that some grave trouble was on his mind.

"Of course I did not expect you," she replied. "You told me you would not be here this evening. And by the way—with a glance at the clock—if you had come five minutes later you would have found all the lights out. This is a queer time to make a call."

She had the faculty of putting others in the wrong. Arthur usually submitted; now, however, he flushed angrily.

"This is a queer hour, too, for you to be having callers," he retorted.

Honora interposed. "Tom Chandler was just going, Arthur. Mildred and I had a long talk with him. It was not his fault that he stayed so late—nor was it Mildred's."

Arthur apologized. "The man's manner changed. 'Oh, he came to see both of you, did he?' he asked. 'I beg your pardon, he did not understand. An apology did not come soon enough. Mildred's eyes flashed."

"May I inquire why you should apologize to Honora for your displeasure—as if the fact of her presence made Tom's call all right. She may let you think that he came to see her as well as me. But he did not. He called me up and asked if he could see me. Honora stayed in the living room through the entire evening of her own choice. You may as well understand that, instead of my being under a call, too, that I mean to have any callers here that I choose to have. If you do not like it, you know what you can do."

"Mildred!" the exclamation was Honora's, and she looked apprehensively at Arthur.

He started towards the door, but Mildred did not move.

"Milly!" Honora's whisper was agonized. "Say you will go."

"I won't!" was the sudden reply. Arthur's hand was on the doorknob when Honora ran to his side. "What are you going to do. I am so sorry."

She stopped, flushing scarlet. "She stammered 'What are you going to do. I am so sorry.'"

He guessed her unspoken thought a light came to his eyes.

"Do you mean," he began.

"Yes," she said. "I do. If I will be of any help to your mother, I will come with you."

(To Be Continued.)

He started towards the door, but Mildred did not move.

"Milly!" Honora's whisper was agonized. "Say you will go."

"I won't!" was the sudden reply. Arthur's hand was on the doorknob when Honora ran to his side. "What are you going to do. I am so sorry."

She stopped, flushing scarlet. "She stammered 'What are you going to do. I am so sorry.'"

NOW---THE Logical Time

There is no chance for cheaper coal for the time being, at least. The cost of mining increased tremendously because of the wage advances granted miners and other causes during the war. Another factor that contributed to higher fuel prices was the increased cost of transportation made necessary by the higher wages of railroad employes.

Now—mining costs will not decrease unless there is a readjustment of the wage scale, and this the operators do not feel inclined to do because of the possibility of strikes.

This is the logical time to buy coal. You can save little or nothing by waiting.

Kelley can supply you all kinds and sizes promptly.

10 Day Bargain Basement Sale

Tuesday---Another Big Day In The 10 Day Bargain Basement Sale

All Selling Records Have Been Broken in This Event

Hundreds of new Extra Special Items brought forward for Tuesday's selling

It pays every person to purchase to the limit in this big sale. Not only because the prices are the lowest in years but because everything in the sale is first quality goods—the same as you would pay regular prices for at any other time. The assortments are very broad because we prepared the sale on a large scale. Of course there are lots that sell out quickly but these are promptly replaced with other lots of equal interest to keep up the standard of the event and to make it sure that everybody will be able to buy what they need. There are just as good values now as there were when the sale started. That's the reason this sale is such a success.
