"What do you do with it?" asked the perpetual interrogator. "The skim milk is condensed. We have a condensing machine in the central receiving station. Of course all the condensing is not done there. We separate the cream from the milk here in our plant, too. That is the raw material that is brought direct to our factory here in Harrisburg," explained Mr. Hershey.

"But the most of it, rather the greater part of all the raw material we get, is brought to the stations. That is the reason it lessens the work here. But the work there is done the same as it is here."

"Do you have the best cattle," asked the Ad man.

"That's important, indeed! And very interesting," replied Mr. Hershey.

"When the milk arrives at the central receiving station it is weighed and tested. It must be of a standard quality, else we would not accept it."

"Are weighing and testing the only things that you do at the central receiving stations?" asked the Ad man.

"No, indeed!" replied Mr. Hershey, in a very surprised manner, as though the Ad man didn't know what he was talking about. "We separate the cream from the milk and then pasteurize it, right there in the central receiving station."

"I didn't think you were equipped for all that work in those places," exclaimed the Ad man. "Is it customary in stations like yours to go through all those operations? Do all creameries have facilities for that kind of work in their receiving stations?"

"Well, to begin with, all ice cream factories do not have their central receiving stations like we have. Most of them buy their raw materials from larger concerns. We sell a great deal of milk and cream to other concerns," replied Mr. Hershey.

"And that is not all we do in the central receiving stations," continued the general manager. "The skim milk is utilized."
