"When a Girl Marries"

By ANN LISLE

A New, Romantic Serial Dealing With the Absorbing Problems of a Girl Wife

CHAPTER CXLIV

It was barely 8 the next morning when Terry telephoned, but I was already dressed and waiting.

"Ready to start, Anne? I've had Tony on the wire, and he's sending round the car; so I'll be over for you directly—say, half an hour, right?"

"Right?" I answered. "I'm ready now. Will you pick up Virginia on the way over?"

"Tony was jolly decent about it, Anne. I put him off going and he said he'd make it right with Virginia." Betty hesitated. "Betty'll want you, but I don't believe in taking down a crowd until we see how she's coming on."

I didn't argue about that with Terry. First, because it would have wasted time, and still more because I was proud he had chosen me to go with him. After putting up the receiver, I hurried into the bedroom and packed a few things in a week-end bag. I had an idea Betty might need me and that I'd better be prepared to stay with her. As I stowed things in my bag it came over me that Jim and I had been separated only once during our married life—the time he had gone to Washington—and then he had left me, not I him.

An impulse of curiosity stirred me. How would he feel when he saw me packing? I was answered in a minute or two, for Jim came in from the bathroom, shaven, looking boyishly clean and sweet and not a bit like the stormy man who had quarreled with me the night before.

"What's this?" Who's going away?" asked Jim, waving the towel with which he was drying his hands, a process he seemed always finished in some place other than where he had started it.

"I thought Betty might need me, and I'd better be prepared to stay," I explained, and my heart started to thump as I spoke.

"Betty?" Jim scowled. "I thought I forbade you having anything to do with the Norreys."

"Forbade?" That word again—I dared not discuss it with Jim now. Instead I asked with what I thought was good-natured ridicule:

"You didn't—ask me not to have anything to do with Anthony's car, did you? He isn't going. Only Terry and me?"

"Only Terry and you?" answered Jim with relief—and no consciousness that I had elaborately avoided the use of a certain word. "Where's Jeanie? Isn't she just as anxious to get Betty as any one else? What's the grand idea in snubbing her?"

My heart seemed to do a tiny somersault—suppose Jim were to be as anxious to spare my feelings as he was always to spare Jeanie's—any hurt—how very fine that would be.

Then I forgot myself, our quarrel, my desire to coax with Jim over my coming absence, the hurt of having him think always of his sister instead of me. For today I didn't count. This day was Terry's. He was taking me along to help

LITTLE TALKS BY BEATRICE FAIRFAX

The other day a girl wrote me a letter that ought to be framed and hung in the museum. As a confession of vanity, it is without parallel in my experience.

The writer is a stenographer in a downtown New York office, and she has been earning her living for several years. But it has not, apparently, taught her the value of money.

A young man employed by the same concern has just persuaded her to become engaged to him. Hence the problem—which is not one of love, nationality, "in-laws," religion, or nothing to live upon. No, it is a new type of agony altogether that my young friend has evolved, and over which she is making herself, "supremely miserable."

Without a pebble to ruffle the course of true love, a single objection from any point of the compass, the young lady has adopted a martyr's crown from which she is getting a melancholy sort of comfort. She wants a wedding, that from the details submitted, would be a close rival of the Princess Pat's. The young man wanted to be married in June, but the girl wouldn't hear of such a thing because she hadn't saved enough money to have a "swell wedding."

Nothing for the Imagination

Some of the requirements of such a ceremony, from my correspondent's point of view, were a matron colored tulle trimmed with cerise of honor dressed in champagne velvet. Six bridesmaids, dressed in white satin, or other dressed in beyond my modest powers to describe. I remember the wealth of adjectives and exclamations points mixed up with white satin, court train, drapery, side plaits, and a borrowed point-lace veil to be put in print as an heirloom—then my mind went blank.

"If John insists on being married in June," she writes, "don't you think he ought to pay for all this?" The potentially "happy man" please remember, earns rather a small salary and there are additional items of a wedding breakfast, not to mention the wedding journey. "If he is willing to wait for two years, I shall have enough saved to pay for these things myself, but I have always set my mind on a swell wedding."

Of course this girl is not in love and of course she has no intention of marrying a man. He is merely a temporarily auxiliary to a fashion sheet. The deepest devotion of which this young woman is apparently capable has been evoked by a white satin gown, a tulle veil, a wreath of orange blossoms, a pair of high-heeled slippers. She calls her feeling for this dressmaker's

MAKING THE MOST OF OUR CHILDREN

A Series of Plain Talks to Parents

By Ray C. Beery, A.B., M.A. President of the Parents Association.

For a child's own future good, if for no other reason, he ought to be taught early to show appreciation of things other people do for him.

Of course, when a child is young, he is not only selfishly inclined but he cannot look far ahead; he thinks only of his immediate pleasure or satisfaction.

Often, when a child discovers that he cannot secure favors by demanding them, he gets a peculiar sense of satisfaction from repeatedly doing so, but the parent who allows him to do this is doing him an actual injustice.

A child should be so trained when he is young that when he leaves home, it will be easy for him to get along with others in the world instead of difficult.

Let us take an example. A mother writes to me:

"What can I do to get our 5-year-old boy to appreciate things? Whenever anything is given him, he will say 'I don't like that, why didn't you get something else?' He isn't satisfied with the stories we tell of the games we play. We do so much for him; I can't see why he is that way."

You have been trying to do too much for this boy and this may be the principal cause of his present habit.

When you are playing some game for the benefit of this boy and he informs you that he doesn't like it, just very calmly drop things for a moment and ask him the simple question, "Do you want mother to play this game with you any longer?" If he says, "no," just say, "All right," and leave him immediately without further words. Take up reading or something else and do not allow him to persuade you to come back—at least for a time. If he teases you, say "I might play with you a little later. I am busy reading just now." If he answers your question by saying "Yes," say to him, "All right, then, let us play it happily and have fun."

A child likes to command others and if others allow him to do so, he becomes very much spoiled and it is not good for him.

Some mothers do not know when to draw the line and most of them make the mistake of catering too much to the child. Some children indeed are very clever at giving their mothers just enough encouragement in their catering to keep them at it. Parents should demand that their children audibly express their appreciation of the slightest act of kindness offered by another person.

Set the good example before your children of appreciating things yourself. Call attention to this thing and that which pleases you. Join your child in doing little acts of kindness for others. Talk much about the kindness of other people toward you. Your child will then begin to appreciate favors himself and he will show his appreciation.

HIS NEAREST RELATIVE

A recruit in one of the cantonments, when called up for examination was asked:

"What is your nearest living relative?"

"What do you mean, 'relative,' mister?" returned the recruit.

"Oh, I mean your nearest living kinsfolk."

"Wal, that's my aunt you're talking about."

Several other questions were answered satisfactorily, when there came:

"In case of death or accident, who shall be notified?"

"My mother," immediately from the selective.

"But you told me just a few minutes ago that your aunt was the nearest living relative that you have," objected the officer.

"You asked me who was my nearest living kin was, didn't you? Wal, Aunt Liz—she lives just two miles from where I been livin'; mother lives five." From the Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

WHY HAIR FALLS OUT

Dandruff causes a feverish irritation of the scalp, the hair roots shrink, loosen and then the hair comes out fast. To stop falling hair at once and rid the scalp of every particle of dandruff, get a small bottle of Danderine at any drug store for a few cents, pour a little in your hand and rub well into the scalp. After several applications all dandruff disappears and the hair stops coming out.

Immense Resources in North Russia Remain Undeveloped

Vladivostok, March 15.—Immense resources in fisheries, lumbering and coal mining await development in the sea of Okhotsk and the island of Shaghalien. Golos Primorya in an article pointing out the need for improved shipping and transportation facilities in that northern region says that with only nine seagoing steamers available, with an aggregate capacity of 327 tons, Nikolaevsk, the center of distribution, exported 25,000 tons of fish last year. The crying need of the industry is more ships, according to the newspaper in question.

"The commercial fleet," continues the paper, "must be made ten or twenty times larger. The coastline of Kamchatka with its rich fisheries, the Sea of Okhotsk as well as the coal producing regions of Shaghalien use Nikolaevsk as a center for distribution. To meet the requirements a commercial fleet of 20,000 tons is necessary. There is enough timber available to supply all Europe and there is enough iron to supply local needs."

Americans Cheerfully Pay High Prices in France; Natives Groan

Paris, March 15.—Americans are cheerfully paying the exorbitant prices charged them for necessities in France, while the natives pay and groan, declared an Associated Press correspondent who has been making an investigation of French high cost of living. Three American newspaper men recently paid $2 for a taxicab ride that the taxi-men said would cost about 70 cents. A meal without wine for the three hungry scribbled cost $20.

The following figures show the difference between prices now prevailing in France and those of the ante-war days:

Butter $2 a pound against 20 cents before war, eggs $2 a dozen versus twenty-two cents and vegetables ranging from fourteen to fifty cents a pound could be obtained for four, five and six cents previous to the war. Cheese has advanced from forty cents to ninety, coffee from forty cents to $1.00. Meat has advanced three hundred per cent., chickens which were sixty cents are now $2 and very slim birds at that.

LINGUISTIC UPS AND DOWNS

"Did you call Edith up this morning?"

"Yes, but she wasn't down."

"But why didn't you call her down?"

"Because she wasn't up."

"Then call her up now and call her down for not being down when you called her up."—From the Boston Transcript.

See CALORIC Exhibit At the Auto Show No Matter What Kind of a Building --- CALORIC Pipeless Furnace Will Heat it Thoroughly

Whether it be a home, a church, a bank, a factory, a public or a private building, the CALORIC will heat it thoroughly. The larger a building, the greater the saving of coal. The great waste of coal in large buildings is due mainly to inefficient heating apparatus. To get at the root of this trouble, you must begin at the furnace. Many makes of furnaces are very costly to install, and are made with elaborate heating arrangements, but in actual working order they do not fill the bill.

The CALORIC Pipeless Furnace is easily installed, costs very little to install, and saves 35 to 50 per cent. of your coal.

Have our representative call on you. He will be very glad to give you full particulars about the CALORIC and show you the CALORIC in operation in any of the 135 homes in Harrisburg.

You can heat from 1 to 18 rooms thoroughly with on register
