AMERICA'S ACE OF ACES STIRS LARGE AUDIENCE

Waves Aside Own Accomplishments in Air to Laud Other Flyers

That the romance of the recent war was to be found in the air was evident to the audience that enjoyed the first-hand story of his experiences by Captain "Eddie" Rickenbacker, America's ace of aces, at the Orpheum Theater last evening.

The famous flyer, wearing the ribbons of the D. S. C., the Croix de Guerre with four palms, and the Medaille Militaire, made a very favorable impression upon and was heartily applauded at frequent intervals by an enthusiastic audience.

Tells Story of White The story he told of Lieutenant Wilbur White, of New York City, commanding the 14th Aero Pursuit Squadron, was one of extraordinary heroism. "During the battle of the Marne I went out on a reconnaissance mission with my squadron, the 94th Pursuit Squadron (the only aero outfit by the way, that went into Germany with the Army of Occupation). Two other squadrons were assigned me for flank protection, one on the right, the other on the left.

Lauds Major Luftbery Captain Rickenbacker, who talked about everybody but himself, paid a high tribute to Major Raoul Luftbery, who had formerly been in command of "Rick's" squadron, and to whom he gave the credit for the reputation which the 94th Squadron acquired. A picture of the little yard belonging to a French peasant, into which the body of the famous flyer dropped when his plane was sent down in flames, was shown on the screen, as well as the broken picket fence which he struck in falling.

He then told a story of a new member of his squadron who was anxious to get a look at German territory and begged Rickenbacker to take him up. "One morning at daylight they started well bundled up against the intense cold of the upper air. While in the clouds the famous ace lost his companion, and when he returned to the airframe several hours later, the young man met him. "Hello, eskimo," he said. "I got so cold I had to come back to thaw out. I'm afraid to land, but for fear I'll crack, why, we were so high up that I saw the sun rising for day after to-morrow."

Violent on the Ground He then related to Lieutenant Frank Luke, the premier "balloon straffer," whom he declared was a violet when on the ground, but a regular firebrand in the air, driving everything and everybody out of his path. "The day he was killed," said Captain Rickenbacker, "he had gone out alone on a still hunt for the 'Boche.' Returning a short time later he dropped a note to one of his own balloon observers, telling him to watch the German 'sausages' opposite, that he was going to get them, and wanted official confirmation of his victories. Sure enough, after a few minutes, one of the balloons went down in flames, then the other two in quick succession. We all waited for him to return, but he never did. After the armistice was signed we got the news of his death from some French peasants in territory previously occupied by the Germans. It seems he had been attacked by half a dozen enemy planes two of whom he got before they brought him down. Landing within their lines, he dived into a shell-hole and drew his automatic, killing several German infantrymen who tried to capture him. Finally they turned a machine gun on him and killed him."

Talks Impersonally As he talked on and on, in an informal manner, one wondered if perhaps he wouldn't describe some of his own engagements, but with the exception of one or two flights he talked impersonally. He did tell of one "dog fight" in which he saw a German plane pursued to earth by a member of his own squadron, who in turn was followed by another German. So Rickenbacker "tagged on to the procession" and of the four that made up the column, each firing at the plane in front of him, all three but himself crashed.

Hin Shows Pictures Among the pictures shown were a number of aerial photographs taken by a German flyer whom Rickenbacker met in Coblenz after the armistice was signed. This flyer heard "Rick," as he called him, was in town and looked him up to show him these photos that he and other Germans had taken over the American lines. They were taken thousands of feet in the air, but clearly showed hangars and aeroplanes, billets, trenches, roads, trees and shell-holes with unmistakable clearness. They had even taken a picture of a section of Paris just as a shell from the long-range gun was bursting on the bank of the Seine river, a picture that must have proved of inestimable value to the Germans in ranging subsequent shots.

The language of the aviator was a bit hard to understand at times, but when he remembered too, Captain Rickenbacker explained the meaning of such words as "zoomed," "plugged," "taxied" and other characteristic expressions of the airman. Asked as to the sporting qualities of his opponents, he said he thought they were about fifty-fifty. "Some were hard-billed eggs of course, but I ran across a number of decent ones who played the game and were daring fliers."

from the other side primarily with the intention of making an attempt at the trans-Atlantic flight. He had the support and backing of Generals Pershing and Liggett, and collected all the necessary data, returning via England in order to gather further information as to trade winds, etc. When he got back to America, however, he found little enthusiasm on the part of the Army authorities on this side, and concluded to drop it. It is his fear that English fliers will carry off the bacon, so to speak. The speaker was introduced by Captain Edward J. Stackpole, Jr., and, following the address, an informal reception was given the man who brought down twenty-six German planes on the western front.
