"When a Girl Marries"

By ANN LISLE

A New, Romantic Serial Dealing With the Absorbing Problems of a Girl Wife us, abated one jot of my feeling of being an intruder and unwelcome withal.

Jim wielded a key with an air of possession, and admitted us to a conventional city apartment.

Big living-room and dining-room darting off from the reception hall at right angles, while a door next the dining room entrance undoubtedly led to the sleeping rooms and baths. Virginia's apartment was similar to that, so was Betty's. I couldn't imagine this place ever seeming distinctly and exclusively mine.

"Plenty of windows for light and air, and—look at the view!" said Jim, with the proud air of a showman, leading me to the great triple windows of the living room.

"Oh, Jim—it's so high! You can look out over everything. It frightens me. Suppose there was a fire?" I cried disjunctly.

"You'd go over the roofs," replied Jim, too absorbed in his own attitude to react to mine.

"Have you—signed the lease?" I asked.

"Here it is. Want to have a look?" Two years, with the privilege of five.

I ran my eyes over the long, double-leaved document Jim presented, but I didn't get much beyond the figures.

"But, Jim—how can you pay such an enormous rent? Why, we've lived on less a month than you're—"

Furiously Jim snatched the lease from me, folded it and returned it to his wallet. He didn't actually break in on what I was saying, but I didn't dare go on. After a moment, during which he seemed to be struggling for self-control, he spoke:

"Now listen to me, Anne, and abide by what I'm saying. Once for all I want you to understand that I'm going to the top. I'm playing a dangerous game, playing with big money. But I'm going to win—to be one of them. They aren't pickers—I don't dare to be. Put up a front and you get a chance to build one, that's

THE HEART BREAKER

A REAL AMERICAN LOVE STORY

By VIRGINIA TERHUNE VAN DE WATER

CHAPTER LXIX

Honora Brent grasped the newspaper that Mrs. Higgins held toward her. For a moment the printed page swam before the girl's eyes. She sat down weakly.

"There must be some mistake," she heard herself saying.

Then she read the article below the glaring headlines, still with a strange feeling of unbelief.

The story was brief. A woman, a former member of a theatrical company that had played a week at the town's burlesque theater had appeared in Fairlands some days ago, accompanied by her lawyer. She had been seen several times with young Chandler. Today, just before noon her lawyer had filed suit for divorce naming "an unknown woman" as correspondent. Later the plaintiff had granted an interview to newspaper men.

According to her statement she had been married to Thomas Chandler for six months. He had traveled for awhile with the company of which she was a member. Then she had gone on through the circuit and he had returned home. She had heard nothing from him until she learned indirectly that he had entered the Army. When she discovered this she hurried to Fairlands and demanded that he acknowledge his marriage before he sailed for France. This he had agreed to do, but had not kept his promise.

It was all told in the paper's most approved "human interest" style. With every word she read Honora felt more deathly ill. She expected to see her sister's name staring her in the face—but Mildred was not mentioned.

"Thank God for that!" she murmured as she concluded the sordid story.

She became aware that Mrs. Higgins was speaking.

"I did not suppose," faltered the widow—plainly alarmed at the effect of the news upon her favorite—"I didn't suppose that you would take it hard Honora. Was—did there wasn't anything between you, I hope? Or was there anything between Mildred?"

A Hard Problem

The girl smiled bitterly. "I advise you not to waste time and strength worrying about imaginary matters Mrs. Higgins."

She was trying to determine how to shield her sister. It would be only a few hours before the whole wretched scandal must be confessed to Mrs. Higgins. And tactfulness was not one of the good woman's virtues.

Miserably Honora fancied how the tale would run through Fairlands and with what gusto it would of mind, it seemed a very short time before she heard the purr of the Bruce machine. The car slid to a standstill at the gate and Arthur leaped out.

"What is it?" he demanded looking anxiously into her ashen face as she met him.

"Mildred!" Honora began, then stopped chokingly.

He looked at her more keenly and drew a chair behind the screen of dead vines sheltering one end of the porch from the view of passers-by.

"Sit here," he ordered, "and tell me all about it."

"Mildred!" Honora faltered, "has gone away—run away with Tom Chandler. I sent for you, for there is nobody else in the whole town who can advise me or to whom I dare go. You love—love my sister. You must help me and her. She is foolish and reckless. That is all. That man lied to her. Have you seen the afternoon papers?"

He shook his head and she handed him the sheet. As his eyes fell on the black headlines, his brows contracted.

"Where did she go?" he asked quickly.

"She came home early this afternoon and packed a suitcase and left a note behind her. That was after we had seen them in the restaurant. That is all I know."

"They have gone to Hartford?" Arthur Bruce announced suddenly.

Advice to the Lovelorn

Wife Has Right of Way

My Dear Miss Fairfax

Being a young girl, 19 years old, considered very attractive, with a host of men admirers and an am popular among the younger set of this city.

As my mother is dead, I am writing to you for advice. I am in dead earnest, so kindly advise me what to do, meet him or try to forget him.

This is my story. I am in love with a married man, who reciprocates my love and I have positive assurance that he does not care for his wife. It seems to be wrong, so I have tried to forget him. He calls me up with invitations to accompany him to theaters and dances, and although I have sometimes accepted, lately I have refused to see him. It is causing us both much pain and God alone knows how near my heart is to breaking. You can see, that as I love him dearly it is ruining my life and as yet no clouds lift from our doubtful skies of love.

Heart Broken

Dear "Heartbroken"

When one is in their teens, everything is so intense, life and love and religion. This is just a phase you are passing through—although you may resent my saying so.

You are inexperienced in life and it is not fair for the man, who probably older and should be wiser than you to bring you into such an affair which can lead nowhere but to sorrow. No matter how far a man wanders from his wife, thinking he cares for someone else more, sooner or later he will go back to her, for there is something in marriage in the fact that she is his wife, that she has "the right of way."

If this man really cares for you he'd sooner die than bring you into such trouble. Don't go out with him, don't even see him. Interest yourself in the daily work and pleasure of your crowd and by and by you will know the experiential power of a new affection, and will wonder how you ever gave this man a thought of love.

How You May Reduce Your Weight

Overstoutness is a very unwelcome condition, especially in the present day, when slender figures are so popular, and every reader of this paper who has noticed a tendency to put on weight will be glad to know of a new, simple home treatment that is remarkably efficient and inexpensive.

If you happen to be one of those whose weight is more than it should be, don't try to reduce by starving yourself; eat all you want, but take after each meal and at bed times five grains of Phynox which you can secure at any drug store.

Phynox is designed to increase the oxygen carrying power of the blood and dissolves fatty tissue, in many cases at the rate of a pound a day. It is pleasant to take and gives remarkable results quickly and easily. Grogans, the druggist, stores, 14 N. Third St., Third and Walnut Sts., and Penna. R. R. Station, can supply you.
