"When a Girl Marries"

By ANN LISLE

A New, Romantic Serial Dealing With the Absorbing Problems of a Girl Wife

CHAPTER CLXXXVI

Three hours of sleep, a bath, a shave and a breakfast, consisting chiefly of black coffee, sent Jim off to business on his first morning at the Walgrave, with at least a veneer of efficiency. The events of the evening before were over and done with, as far as he was concerned, and his attention was focussed on the day ahead. But that night seemed to spread its shadow over his whole day.

He snapped at Neal when he phoned as he promised, but refused to meet me or give me his address. The effects of snapping were plain when Neal cried:

"Look here Babbs—if you're going to nag, I won't phone you at all."

Then he rang off, and I was left to wonder if I must pursue Evvy again in order to get some word of my brother.

Later in the morning, when Virginia went with me to Tom Mason's studio to select the furnishings for our new apartment, I forgot to thank him for the red roses that had greeted us at the Walgrave. When Virginia was across the studio studying some Egyptian lamps, he whispered meaningly:

"You got my roses? Red roses for—the woman the white lilac lady might be."

"I got them," I said coldly.

"I understand your not mentioning them," Tom glanced toward Virginia. "I wish I could make every place you go fragrant with roses."

"Stop!" I gasped. "Don't! I shouldn't be here selecting our decorations except for James's faith in you. He's your friend. Remember that."

"And I am YOUR friend. Remember that. Don't act as if it were a crime for a man to want to serve you. I didn't choose to—like you. I just happened to whether I choose or not. And I can no more help longing to see you happy than I can help loving the sunshine and blue sky. There isn't much happiness in the world, but I'd like to buy it all and give it to you, Donna Anna."

Again there were harsh words on my lips. I was on the verge of repeating the words I had said that night in Chinatown: "You are a cad, and I know it now—know it for all time." But Virginia's return stopped me, and afterwards I was glad that I had not snapped at Tom Mason also in my tiredness and reawakened dread of Jim's gambling.

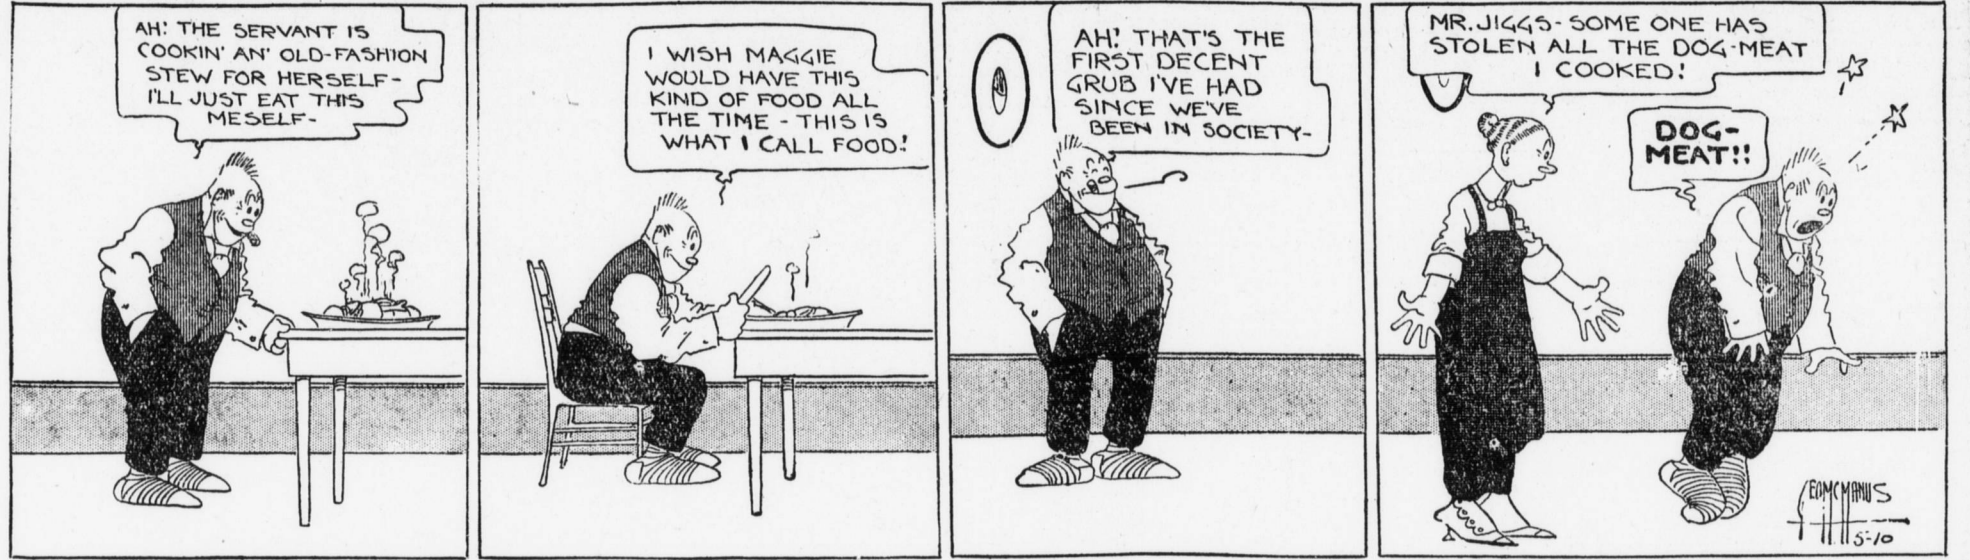

Half-heartedly I listened while Tom and Virginia discussed the rival merits of English and Italian period furniture. This was my home they were planning, but I was so tired that I found no joy in ancient robes and rare tapestries. I didn't care what went into my home, so only I got out of Tom Mason's studio. This wasn't 'nest building,' Jim ought to be with me.

"All right. We'll do the walls in biscuit, and have biscuit or black

CHAPTER LXXXVII

As the two sisters left the breakfast table the following morning the postman's whistle sounded, and Honora went to the front door to take the mail from him.

There was one letter for Mrs. Higgins and one for Honora. This last was addressed in Arthur Bruce's handwriting. Instinctively the recipient turned the address down before anyone else could see it.

At that instant the telephone bell rang, and Mildred answered it. From her tone her sister was aware that she was receiving some communication that pleased her.

"Yes, this is Mildred. Oh, good morning! Oh, thank you Mrs. Hilton. You are very kind. I shall be delighted to come. You are very good to think of such an insignificant small person as myself."

What pretty manners! Myself had when she wanted to make a pleasant impression, Honora mused. People could not help liking her. Even her employer, seeing her day in and day out, thought that she was a warm-hearted, well-bred little creature—while his wife was ready to make quite a pet of the child. Her bearing and her face would win her friends anywhere, always, supposing she thought them worth winning.

Going to her bureau, she laid out a pair of silk stockings to match her gray gown.

"You will have time to do all that this afternoon," her sister suggested.

As she saw that Mildred was determined to take her time about the proceeding, she put on her own hat and coat and hurried from the house.

A Note From Arthur

But she had to defer the reading of her letter until she reached the office. For she had not gone a half-hour before she heard Mildred running to overtake her.

"Why didn't you wait for me?" the latter chided. "I hate walking down alone."

She fell into step with Honora, and did not stop chattering until she parted from her at the door of the building in which were Mr. Pearson's offices.

And the subject of the entire discourse was Harold Hilton. It was evident that he occupied all of Mildred's horizon this morning.

Arthur Bruce's note to Honora was brief.

It reminded her that he must leave for camp before long and asked her to give him the opportunity of calling on her as soon as possible.

"I want to see you," he wrote. "When can we have an uninterrupted talk?"

Honora remembered with gratitude that Mildred was to be away from home this evening. She was glad not to have to resort to any planning or subterfuge to have an interview with Arthur.

In the few minutes in which she waited for the arrival of her employer she wrote a hasty note and dropped it in the mailchute in the hall. The contents were meager, but sufficient. They simply said that the writer would be at home this evening and glad to receive her possible caller at 8 o'clock.

Then she went about her work, trying not to be too glad that each hour that passed brought the evening—and her visitor—nearer.

"Watchful Waiting"
A Bad Coal Policy

Should coal consumers adopt "a waiting for a more favorable time" attitude, and not buy coal in summer, there will be a repetition of the coal famine of 1917.

Let us not forget the suffering and worry and sickness that came down upon many Harrisburg families two winters ago, when everybody wanted coal at once and would have paid any price to get it.

Don't wait and get caught in the fall and winter "coal rush." If you wait till fall or winter, you will have to pay higher prices, but, what is worse, you may not be able to get coal at all when you need it most.

The quality of the coal shipped in summer is so much better than you get in winter that it is worth your while to fill your bins, even should there be no advance in price. However, prices will advance at least 50c per ton during the summer.
