By ANN LISLE

New, Romantic Serial Dealing With the Absorbing Problems of a Girl Wife

CHAPTER CXXIII. A beaming Neal was waiting for me in the lobby of the Clinecure. A Neal triumphant. His red curls flung themselves up like a challenge to the world and his shoulders went back so jauntily that his flicker of restlessness in his eyes. The old uniform didn't look shabby now.

"Well, Babbsie, you sure are grand with that new copper kettle on your head. That's some swell bonnet, and if there's a prettier girl in the room than my sister, I hope they don't point her out to a fellow with a weak heart!" he cried all in one breath.

"Do I look nice, Neal?" I preened under his glance, for Jim hadn't seemed to see me for so long that a word of admiration was a treat.

"I'll say so!" chorled Neal. "And if asked, I'll bet every other mother's son in the place will say as much or more. You sure are there with the looks, Babbs, and it only takes half-way decent clothes to give you a chance to prove it."

Suddenly the nine hundred and fifty dollar order for clothes stopped being a mountain and became a mere molehill. I squeezed Neal's hand and skipped along at his side, crying: "Well, if I look half as good to you as you do to me, Neal darling, the contentment on our faces must make folks wonder when we publish the banns. Now, lad, where do we go from here? I'm just aching to hear all about you."

"We go to a specially selected table by the window and to a specially prepared lunch at the same."

"Neal, we're not lunching at the Clinecure?"

"And why not, pray? Isn't this swell enough for Madame Harrison? Prefer Carter's?"

"I began awkwardly, wondering if my proud young brother could be persuaded to let me pay for the lunch."

"I know what it is, Babbs. Well,

THE LOVE GAMBLER

CHAPTER X.

James Carey, to whom Samuel Leighton had written for his new chauffeur's reference, was wise enough to make no protest to David De Laine's scheme. In his heart he was rather glad to learn of it. From a distance he had watched this son of his old friend—for Carey and David's father had been boys together.

David's mother had died when he was a baby. Her husband had known how to make money, but he also had known how to spend it recklessly. At the time of the father's death the only son was twenty years old. When the debts were all paid and the funeral bills settled, very little remained of what had been a comfortable fortune.

It was then that Miss Jeanne De Laine proposed that her nephew make his home with her. "I will help you financially, my dear Davey," she had said. But David was firm in his determination to stand on his own feet. He had succeeded in working his way through college, and had secured a decent, but not very remunerative position, which he held until the outbreak of the war. Then he enlisted.

All this James Carey knew, for he had corresponded with David from time to time. He had gloried in what he called "the boy's spunk" and in not accepting his aunt's offer to support him. Now that David had written him of the terms of Miss De Laine's will, he gloried still more in the stand taken by his young friend. Anything that David had asked of him he was willing to do. Therefore, if the lad wanted to be an ordinary chauffeur, Carey would send his possible employer such a letter as an ordinary chauffeur would want written to the man for whom he hoped to work.

A Favorable Report "I know the young man about whom you inquire," Mr. Carey wrote to Mr. Leighton. "I have known him from his boyhood. He is industrious, honest, trustworthy, and has no bad habits. Were I in need of someone to drive a car, I would not hesitate to employ David Smith."

A copy of this note was enclosed in James Carey's letter to David. "Here is what I am mailing to your new employer," he wrote. "I hope it is what you want. I am proud of you. Indeed, I have always been proud of you. You are quite right to prefer to work under an assumed surname. Baltimore and New York are not so far apart after all, and De Laine is not a common name. I am never afraid that you will dishonor it—but just because you do honor it, you want to avoid its becoming the subject of curious comment. Write me when you can, and when you make enough money to take a trip South make me happy by coming here."

"I may add that I am glad you never met that young woman to whom your poor rich aunt was so anxious to see you married. I use the word 'poor' advisedly, for I have a sincere pity for any one who thinks that love can be bought. (You see, I am an old bachelor—a very old one—so have romantic notions still.)

"I suppose I should pity the girl, too. Not because she is great material in marrying you, but because she has so little delicacy as to be party to a scheme to trap a young man. Your aunt had the excuse of her love for you and her afterthoughts that she was not to be bought. No excuse except a desire to get married. You are fortunate never to have met her. "Ye gods!" David De Laine sprang to his feet when he read this condemnation and began to walk up and down his hall room. "I did not mean to give the dear old chap the impression that Aunt Jeanne's protégée was aware of my great love for her. I must write him that the girl may have known nothing of them. But—I wonder if she did!"

COFFEE is the fighting man's drink. It did its bit in the war right manfully. In the camp, on the march, at the front, in the hut and hospital, wherever men fought and bled and suffered and died—there was coffee.

Ever and always the cry was—coffee! Because it gives cheer and comfort, and courage. It is soothing, quieting, sustaining. The tired man calls for it. Exhausted nature asks for it. After the lesson of this war—who shall say that coffee is not healthful—and needful?

Be thankful for coffee—for the delight of it, the benefit of it, the real downright goodness of it. There is nothing in the world you would miss one-half so much as coffee—if you were suddenly deprived of it! Indeed—coffee is one of the truest and "real-est" of friends that Nature has given to men. Let us rejoice in it, and revel in it. Let us glory in the charm and flavor and piquancy of it. Let us toast our friends in it—"Here's to your health and happiness!"
