PRAISE FOR WAR

Proofs that Army life makes me

Proofs that Army life makes men more valuable to business interests, and that military training brings efficiency, are given in a letter from William Elmer, Superintendent of the Philadelphia division, Pennsylvania railroad, writing to Colonel J. B. Kemper, local Army recruiting officer. Superintendent Elmer says:

"We are pleased to advise that those of our employes, who have been returned from Army service have shown a marked improvement in their performance since having served under Army discipline. Their experience seems to have increased their efficiency to a remarkable degree, and the improvement has been so noted that it has attracted the attention not only of the supervisory officers, but of the rank and file of their fellow workers.

"We feel that our service has been benefited by the return of these men, not only by reason of their increased efficiency and splendid discipline, but also by reason of the example they set their fellow workmen."
