"When a Girl Marries"

A New, Romantic Serial Dealing With the Absorbing Problems of a Girl Wife

CHAPTER CXXII
You didn't have to go!" burst from my lips before I had time to realize that what I was just saying was the wrong thing to me to say.

Jim's hand tightened on mine. He looked at me pleadingly and then he flung himself up and down the room with long, limping strides that made my heart ache.

"Can you forgive me?" he asked abruptly. "I was mad! I flung out of here—to think about other things, and all I could think about was you! I wanted you every minute of the time I was gone. I couldn't see Terry and Betty. If West had come back I couldn't have said a word to him after I'd waited all day for him. I just sat in the office and hated myself and wondered—if you'd take me back after the way I cleared out and deserted you."

"Why, Jim, I never thought that you'd deserted me," I began, but Jim went on:

"Some poet chap once wrote about every man killing the things he loves. I thought I'd done that, you didn't like me any more, I've hurt you over and over. I don't know why, Anne. I've been a brute. But if you ever wanted to pay me up these last twenty-four hours ought to satisfy you."

"I'm so glad you're here, Jim," I said, trying to keep my voice low and controlled. "I was just going to call the club and ask you to come home."

"Don't make me feel any more like a brute than I do, Anne," Jim muttered in a husky voice.

"You wonder-girl, you! My girl!" cried Jim, gathering me to him again.

"You still love me?" "You never stopped, Jim," I replied.

"I let him have his way. What did it matter that he had let me alone through a long night and a day? He had come back. Later I might question and wonder and dread the coldness that always follows so soon on Jim's tenderness, but in this moment, when he seemed mine again, I didn't question anything. I was too happy."

"Anne," said Jim, "Anne—this seems like a miracle. To come back and find you here—after that dreadful night, when you thought the gossamer of our happiness."

"I looked at Jim in amazement. Had he suffered, too?" "Don't look at me like that!" he cried. "As if you couldn't believe me, as if you—didn't know me, Anne, I missed you, I tell you—all day long I wasn't good for a darn thing. I found out I couldn't live without you."

"But, Jim—I don't understand!"

THE LOVE GAMBLER

By Virginia Terhune Van de Water

CHAPTER XXII
Had David DeLaine been in love with Desiree's Maid as Samuel Leighton had suggested—he could hardly have been more perturbed in mind than he was as he drove the car back to the garage after parting from his employer.

There ensued some commotion and altercation. The cab-driver—whose fault the accident had been—was loud in his imprecations. David was more quiet, and after giving his name and address to a policeman—who, however, exonerated him from blame—drove his car slowly to the garage.

Another chance to get in wrong; he mused gloomily. "This has surely been my unlucky night. And I am to call Miss Leighton up in the morning for orders. When I do I will have to inform her that the limousine is at the repair shop. Sweet for me!"

He arose early next day and left the limousine at the shop at which Mr. Leighton had his repairs done. Then he returned to the garage to make sure that the smaller car—a handsome runabout—was all ready for use. He had used this smaller car on several occasions when he had driven his employer down to the office or had brought him home. He had never used it since he had been driving for her. But she must ride in it to-day.

"The car is not badly injured," he replied, ignoring her involuntary inquiry about himself. "The mud-guard is bent, and the glass of one of the lights is broken. It will be in good condition again by night, so can be used to-morrow."

"How did the accident happen?" "It was a simple thing, Miss Leighton. But why did you not hear or see the taxi sooner?" she interrupted. "Why weren't you more careful?"

"I'm afraid," she confessed wistfully, "that my thoughts were wandering. The street was almost empty, and I got to thinking—I was off my guard. I suppose I should not be surprised."

"I beg your pardon!" he exclaimed interrogatively, not comprehending. "Never mind!" she said brusquely. "I must go down town, so will have to use the runabout. I hate it, but it can't be helped. Be here at eleven."

He, David DeLaine, might have been Desiree Leighton's suitor; and she, who had been the friend and guest of his aunt, now thought of him as the lover of her maid.

He reiterated that last part of this assertion so often that, had he been a psychologist, he might have doubted his own belief in it. Too vehement protestations may prove that one is not quite sure of the truth he professes.

So absorbed was David in self-explanations that he saw too late a taxi-cab swing around the corner just ahead of him. The driver, careless or drunk—swerved suddenly to one side, but not quickly enough to avoid a collision with the mud-guard of the Leighton limousine.
