He spent the rest of his life traveling through northern Germany, preaching and establishing churches. There are sixteen Mennonite denominations, containing altogether 80,000 members in 838 churches. Of these 35,000 are members of the church in the general conference of Mennonites has 15,400 members.

The Moravian church is an outgrowth of the national church of Bohemia founded by Jan Hus, a correct name of the church is Unitas Fratrum (Unity of Brethren). The Brethren were persecuted in Bohemia and Moravia, where they established their churches as protestant superintendents of the church, and fled to the estate of Count Zinzendorf in Saxony. From Germany the Brethren came to Georgia in 1735, and five years later removed to Pennsylvania, where they founded Bethlehem, which is still the center of the northern province of the Moravians.

The River Brethren are close to the Mennonites in beliefs and practices. They came to Pennsylvania from Switzerland in 1750, and now number (in three divisions) 112 churches and 5,389 members. Their name has reference to the Susquehanna river, near which they settled. The Plymouth Brethren are so called because many of them gathered in Plymouth, England, in the first half of the last century. Their real name is Brethren.
