"When a Girl Marries"

By ANN LISLE

A New, Romantic Serial Dealing With the Absorbing Problems of a Girl-Wife

CHAPTER CXXXVIII.

So you waited up for your wandering boy, nice person?" cried Jim approvingly when he came back from seeing Phoebe home that evening he'd served his partnership with Dick West.

"And I made you some sandwiches and hot chocolate," I appended. "Come to the party. It's all ready in the dining-room."

"Nice—nicest person," said Jim, flinging his arm across my shoulders and drawing me to him. "I couldn't eat dinner—with West opposite me at table, and I'll bet you guessed it," he added.

I nestled close, giving myself over to the joy of Jim's need of me. For a second we stood in silence, his hand on my hair.

I forced myself to be practical: "Come on, laddie, you know now you hate chocolate when the milk curd comes on top."

Jim gulped down two cups of scalding chocolate before he spoke again, and then he burst out with what had been milling around back of his tense eyes.

"Does Phoebe really look so—delicate?"

"Not a bit, Jim. She's been worried, but you banished her fears to-night, didn't you?" I asked soothingly.

"Yes. But it didn't make her happy. I knew that in spite of all she said, sweet, grateful baby that she is. My mother went—of pernicious anemia. And to-night I noticed what a little ghost Phoebe is. Her lips haven't a bit of color any more."

"They never did," I broke in bitterly. "Not till Evvy taught her to use a lip-stick. They were great friends—while Evvy was educating Phoebe in the things she wanted the child to know."

Jim studied me for a moment.

"See much of your brother these days?" he demanded suddenly, giving all his attention to the selection of a sandwich.

"He's coming to dinner Saturday night, with Evvy," I answered.

"Oh, that reminds me—she telephoned and I was to call her. Maybe they aren't coming. I'll ring her up first thing in the morning."

Men Directing Cumberland's Big Patriotic Demonstration

These are some of the men who are co-operating to make Carlisle's patriotic celebration a big success. They are: top row, left to right, the Rev. H. B. Stock, chairman, service flag demobilization committee; E. S. Kronenberg, chairman, general committee; Major E. R. Plank, commander in charge of military division; bottom row, left to right, Merkel Landis, treasurer, general committee. Fisk Goodyear, chairman, W. S. S. committee and marshals of war workers; Lieutenant R. T. Shearer, chairman, military committee; H. A. Ewing, chairman finance committee and marshal second division.

head of the establishment came to the room the satin-clad maid had assigned us.

"It will suit you—parfaitment," gushed Madame, shrugging her shoulders and spreading her hands in a gesture of enthusiasm which evoked a patronizing smile from Evvy.

Of course the color and the model were all wrong for me. But Evvy cajoled and Madame insisted, and since my heart wasn't in the business anyway I ordered an outrageous expensive dress which I didn't want.

"And now," purred Evvy with husky sweetness, "be a dear and run get the little silver gray I've chosen for Miss Harrison."

Madame trotted off obediently, and I turned to Evvy, repeating stupidly:

"Miss Harrison? Who is that?"

"Who is that?" mimicked Evvy with her blue eyes wide as a kitten's turned toward a saucer of cream. "Phoebe, of course. We were always great friends. Just because I haven't seen much of her recently I wouldn't offend her by leaving her out. I phoned this morning, but she was lying down. But, of course, Mrs. Dalton accepted for her."

THE LOVE GAMBLER

By Virginia Terhune Van de Water

CHAPTER XXV.

Desiree Leighton was very honest with herself, so honest that she would not have disputed her maid's comment on the state of her temper could she have overheard it.

For she was in a bad temper. She knew that. And she was at a loss to account for it. She almost wished that her new chauffeur had never come into her father's employ. His aura and hers must be entirely different, she reflected, if an ordinary chauffeur had any aura! At all events, he was affecting Nora in an unfortunate way. And Nora's mistress was in no mood to stand that kind of thing.

She had informed her father last night that he must talk to Smith about his rude behavior, and the parent had done this. But he had evidently not remonstrated to any effect. Otherwise Smith would not have come into the house and remained chatting with Nora.

All these thoughts rushed through Desiree's mind as she went slowly down her front steps and crossed the sidewalk to where David stood, holding open the door of the runabout.

She nodded as he touched his cap; then she glanced critically at the automobile.

"I am sorry you had to bring this car for me," she commented.

"I dislike it."

He made no reply. When he had seen her seated he went around to the other side, took his seat beside her and closed the door. Then he started his engine and waited, his hands on the steering-wheel, for her orders.

Absentminded

"I am ready," she said absentmindedly. "Drive on."

"Yes, miss," doubtfully. "But where?"

She flushed. "I thought I had told you. Drive out to Fifth Avenue, then down as far as Fifty-eighth street. I had a call to make there."

But when she reached the avenue she changed her mind. "Go down to Hilton's—the florists," she said. "I want to take some flowers to the sick friend."

He did not reply, only bowed mutely.

"Did you hear me, Smith?" she asked tartly.

"I beg your pardon?" he exclaimed. "Yes, miss. I heard you. That you should have answered me," she reproved.

"I—I was not aware that I did not," he apologized. "I meant to."

She interrupted him. "Thinking seems to be one of your failings just now, Smith. At least thinking of other things besides your duties. You told me over the phone this morning that you were 'thinking' when you ran into a cab."

"Pardon me," he corrected, "when the cab ran into me."

"That makes no difference," she said. "Had your mind been on your work you would have been on the lookout for the mistakes of other drivers."

He did not reply. His silence irritated her.

"Yes, miss—I drove for a gentleman."

"Well, then," she said, feeling suddenly very foolish, although she could not have explained the reason—"perhaps that is why you have not considered certain trifles of importance. But even that would not account for your wandering thoughts. You have something on your mind that absorbs you, perhaps. I would suggest that you do not let yourself think of it during working-hours."

Again he was silent. But this time she did not reprove him.

Something in his face embarrassed her. She wished they were not sitting side by side. Her anger had died down. She felt as if she had made some ridiculous mistake.

Old Free Trade Talk Not Heard in Washington

Washington, July 3.—Conspicuous by its absence in these days is the talk in Washington in favor of the doctrine of free trade.

One might almost ask, in the language of that well-known Hoosier poet, "who remembers the old-time politician who used to orate on the merits of free trade?"

Even the President in his message recognized the idea that competition with the foreign producer was a thing to be considered.

The hearings before the House ways and means committee on protection for the dye industry are bringing out some interesting things. For instance, one of the witnesses was Grinnell Jones, chemical expert of the tariff commission. He told the committee that while the industry had grown greatly he regarded government protection as essential for its development. He said 77 firms were making dyes in 1918 and more factories would be started if the industry were given protection. It has never been charged that the tariff commission was a high tariff body.

A Ready Made Coffee Pure and Delicious

This is the story of a coffee that does not have to be made! And the way of it is this:

It was necessary for our boys in the trenches to have real coffee, and yet they did not have the means to make it. So Hires Instant Soluble Coffee was made.

And as proof that Hires Instant Soluble Coffee met every government requirement, 85-2-3 per cent. of all the trench coffee contracted for by the American Army was this same Hires Instant Soluble Coffee. We couldn't agree to supply more than this because our facilities would not permit.

Carefully chosen coffee beans from a choice selection of Java and Mocha coffee are used in making Hires Instant Soluble Coffee. And the pure delicious juice of these beans is dried and converted into a powdered, soluble form. Immediately water is added, the coffee powder dissolves and becomes as originally made.

Having Hires Instant Soluble Coffee, means no more trouble over the coffee pot and no more emptying coffee grounds. It means that elimination of waste. You make coffee just as you want it—whenever you want it, too. And you don't have two or three cups left over in the pot.

And Hires Instant Soluble Coffee can now be secured in small or large tins, for use right in your home. A small can of Hires Instant Soluble Coffee is equivalent to 2 pounds of the best Mocha and Java coffee. The low price is due to the fact that with our exclusive process we extract 100 per cent. more juice from the bean than you can in making coffee in the old way. Get it in all stores.
