this outdated talk of "wifeliness." in the sense of self-effacement. The mothers who have been praised by their children haven't ever been colorless, mindless, spiritless women. They've been the courageous, reso-lute, honorable women who are, we have all come to see, the only real women, to say nothing of being the only women who deserve to be mothers at all. Other Attributes mothers at all. Other Attributes It is true that the husband I have quoted mentioned other points in his wife's character. He said that her being "the truest and most loving wife in the world" made him "the richest of men." Doubless any wo-man's love, if it's genuine, is a prec-tious thing. But the love of such a woman as he had described does surely constitute riches. The affec-tion of any weak, clinging creature isn't to be taken lightly. But the devotion of a "perfect woman" is a thing to inspire and fortify. It's true that the self-distrusting man may feel that he would be thing to inspire and fortify. It's true that the self-distrusting man may feel that he would be safer with a wife who was a shade less than perfect. An utterly irre-proachable woman might apply an uncomfortably high standard, might perceive his own faults rather more clearly than he would fancy. Who is he, he asks himself, that he should expect to marry a completely super-ior woman? Give him one with a few human failings. There may be something in this point of view. It's even borne out by the document I've been discuss-ing. The husband who found his wife pefect was able to say of him-self, also in the will, that he had never told his wife a falsehood, never deceived her or broken a promise to her. That's a really solemn and im-pressive statement. A husband of whom this was true apparently deserved his wife's fidel-ity and devotion. Truth and honor must have been very real things in that home. And in what other kind
