Visiting the Shops With Adele

DO you love the newest of the new? If you do, here's a suggestion for you: Make your way to Saltzgriver's Art and Antique Store, 223 North Second street, and ask to see the beautiful electric table lamp that I'm going to describe. If I can't find it, I'll say, "It's not here." It's a gracefully wrought iron base ending in a candle effect and capped with a yellow shade of glazed silk. And such a wise, wise shade as it is! Deliberately combining an odd shape of unusual attraction with a hand-painted surface, it turns its ordinary sisters green with envy. Not that it wants to—it just can't help it. For the same reason, it just can't help being the perfect answer to the difficult gift problem.

THIS time we go straight to Paris, to the house of Dreyfus for our inspiration. And we proudly bring the resulting masterpiece back to Harrisburg and place it in the window of the Closs Shop in the Penn-Harris building. There it is for all to see. Created by the most original V-shaped neck, tapering skirt, blouse back, and three-quarter sleeves, it savors so strongly of Paris that even the most obtuse observer would instantly detect its French origin. Starting out to be of darkest blue, it suddenly sweeps from its original purpose, and ends in a lavish display of vivid color. Wonderful Zephyr embroidery of such brilliance, completely covers the skirt, accepting the name for the sudden transformation.

ISN'T this interesting? In the year 600 B. C. a fossil resin was found on the shores of the Baltic Sea was discovered to possess the peculiar property of attracting small bits of paper and wood when briskly rubbed. This resin, known as amber, was called "resin electrum" by the Greeks. In the early part of the sixteenth century Dr. Gilbert, by steadily changing the Greek name, first suggested the phenomenon associated with it "electric." Hence, our term electricity! For two thousand years this little bit of information had constituted the whole of electric science, barring a slight knowledge of lightning, which no one connected with the amber phenomenon. Then along came Franklin, and how things did change! For instance, to-day we run our homes by electricity. And that is why we find the Dauphin Electric Supply Co., 43 Market street, absolutely indispensable, with its complete line of everything electrical.

MRS. AGNES SCARLETT

"Too much can not be said for the wonderful work done by the American Red Cross in France and at home," was the statement made this morning by Mrs. Agnes Scarlett, who returned last evening to her home, 1730 Green street, after serving overseas for almost nine months as a secretary with the Red Cross. Mrs. Scarlett landed in New York Sunday, on the George Washington. She was the only Red Cross worker aboard. One of the things which particularly impressed her on the homeward trip was the manner in which her sister workers met them at every stopping place, thus assuring the safety of the returning girls. Leaving this country November 20, 1918 Mrs. Scarlett first went to Paris where she stayed for two weeks. From there she was sent to Brest remaining until July 25. In speaking of Brest, she stated that it is one of the greatest centers for the work being done in France. With four hospitals and five canteens, it carries on a truly remarkable work. The canteen at Pier 5 Brest is considered to be the finest in that country. Built by the Army and given over to the Red Cross it contains every convenience possible for the comfort of the men. The rest rooms are most home-like. On record days, this canteen has served through 22,000 returning boys, giving each a gift of socks or a comfort bag filled with chocolate, cookies, cigars, chewing gum, tobacco and cards. In addition, the boys are given over to hot coffee and sandwiches. One of the important pieces of work carried on overseas was that done by the Home Communicators, established by the Red Cross, which sent out searchers to seek for any information desired by the folks at home about dead or wounded soldiers. The boys, in turn, had received word of their families through the same source. Mrs. Scarlett, who was with the Home Communicators at Camp Pontanezen, near Brest, said that the boys were laid to rest beneath the old barracks used to shelter Napoleon's troops still stand, as many as 85,000 American boys have been buried in a time. It is there that Camp Hospital, No. 22, the great distributing center, is to be found. Mrs. Scarlett, who was in warehouse No. 4, in charge of Captain Earle J. Crowl, said that as high as 5,000 sweaters, socks, and scarfs, all made by American women, have been distributed at one time, and that the hundreds of crates stored there, filled with sweaters and every other sort of comfort imaginable, present a wonderful illustration of what the American women can accomplish at short notice.
