To Award Prizes

The money prizes were awarded at the field to-day, but all other prizes may be obtained by winning contestants by applying to 1314 Vernon street, at Springer's Grocery. Harrisburg grocers and their friends did not carry off all the honors to-day when it came to the different contests; Port Deposit, New Cumberland, Enola, Lemoyne, Highspire and many other towns have a few winners in their ranks and proudly bore away the well known bacon.

The Hershey pool claimed a lot of mermaids and men to-day, too, and the big crowd could scarcely get to its luncheon, so attractive was the clear water. The grocers could not have had a more beautiful day for their picnic, and everyone appreciated this fact and was determined to make the most of it. When the baseball game began this morning and two big biplanes sailed slowly over the field, their wings gleaming brightly in the sunlight, there were long drawn out ejaculations of admiration from the mob in the grandstand.

America is to be honored this Fall by the visit of Belgium's fighting King and his entire family, according to a recent Washington dispatch. Complaint Filed Against Grade Crossing by the Highway Commissioner

The first action on the part of the Commonwealth for the abolishment of the dangerous grade crossing at the western end of the Dauphin Narrows was taken to-day when Highway Commissioner Lewis S. Sadler filed a complaint against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Philadelphia and Reading Railway Company alleging that the crossing was dangerous and should be eliminated.

The crossing is the one which forms the dividing line between Dauphin borough and Middle Paxton township and is just at the southern end of Dauphin. A number of accidents which have resulted in deaths have occurred at the crossing in recent years and with large piles of lumber being placed to the west of the crossing it is practically impossible to see either up or down the tracks of the two railroads until one is directly upon them. The companies have had a watchman at the crossing for some time, but with the opening of the State highway system above Dauphin to the Clark's Ferry bridge, traffic will increase greatly on this road and in the interest of safety the Highway Department seeks to have the crossing eliminated entirely. It is likely that provision will be made for a subway through joint co-operation of the Highway Department, the Public Service Commission and the two railroad companies.

Jury in Ford and Tribune Case Is Now Considering Verdict

By Associated Press.

Mount Clemens, Mich., Aug. 14.—The jury which for three months has been hearing testimony and arguments in Henry Ford's $1,000,000 libel suit against the Chicago Daily Tribune, retired to-day to consider its verdict.

Judge James G. Tucker instructed the jury that "the right of fair comment" is expected in the case of Mr. Ford, because his position as a great employer of labor and entry as a propagandist into the discussion of the preparedness question made him a public character.

The judge held that a newspaper has no greater privileges in making comment than has an individual.

The jury was instructed further to discuss the case against the Solomon News Company, which, on a purely technical charge that it distributed in Michigan 208 copies of the Tribune issue of June 23, 1916, containing the alleged libelous editorial headed "Ford Is An Anarchist," was made a co-defendant.

Counsel for the plaintiff at the opening of the case announced that as the Solomon Brothers distributed the paper in ignorance of its contents, no damages were sought.

Scientific Discussions by Garrett P. Serviss

Here is a question from a young woman, and I wonder how many young women are as observant as she shows herself to be of things usually called "scientific."

"Why does the light coming from a searchlight when radiating heavenward appear to the observer to stop abruptly on contact with the sky? I observed this at Forty-second street when the beam came from a gigantic searchlight on a Government truck. At the angle where it met tthe sky it stopped."

It becomes invisible where it passes out of the dusty lower layers of the atmosphere. The stoppage is not always quite so abrupt, but in peculiar circumstances it may appear as if the beam of light actually ended at a certain point. This is apt to be the case if you are looking in a direction not far from parallel to that in which the light is cast. Then the beam seems to disappear in the sky. But if you are a long distance from the source, the beam will appear to fade away more gradually, while if it is projected at a low angle it will pass almost horizontally overhead and diminish in brightness so imperceptibly that you cannot easily say where it comes to an end. But when it rises into the clearer atmospheric layers above it quickly vanishes.

Nevertheless it would not fail to illuminate an object placed beyond the point of its visual disappearance. You do not see the light-rays constituting the beam, but you see the minute atmospheric particles illuminated by the rays along their path. If the atmosphere were removed the most powerful searchlight beam would be entirely invisible, although it would illuminate any objectt against which it was thrown, even more brilliantly than if the air were present, because none of the light would be absorbed, or diffused, on the way from the source to the target. On the moon, for instance, a searchlight would be very effective in illuminating any object toward which it was aimed, but it would show no shaft, or beam, of light.

The principle on which a searchlight is constructed is a very interesting one.

If some malignant demon should choose to amuse himself with a little bonfire in space he could burn the earth up by simply applying this principle to the sun, concentrating the rays from the greater part of its disk into a parallel, or a convergent beam and focussing that beam upon our planet. The long beam, 93,000,000 miles in length, would be utterly invisible to the inhabitants of other planets, who would be amazed to see the earth suddenly kindle and burn without any apparent reason.

In consequence of the divergence of the rays proceeding in all directions from the spherical surface of the sun, the earth actually receives less than one two-thousand-millionth part of the heat that the sun scatters in space all around at the earth's distance.

In consequence of this apparent waste of mighty energies, some persons from whom I receive letters are unable to believe that the sun really does send its radiations in every direction, radially from its surface. They prefer to think that the rays of the sun go only to its planets, and not to empty space where there are no planets to receive them.

This would certainly be an incomparably more economical arrangement, and one peculiarly appealing to the "business mind," but Nature seems to ignore all our ideas of business and economy — unless the fact be that we have no conception of her real objects. We begin in all such reasonings with the enormous assumption that we, and the things that we can comprehend, and which directly console objects of her care.

She plainly rebukes that assumption every day of our lives by paying not the slightest attention to our desires and interests, but going straight ahead along her own incomprehensible way, and yet we seldom or never learn the lesson she thus conveys, or even preceive that there is a lesson to be learned.

Perhaps it is far more important to the sun, or to the guiding intelligence behind the sun, that his rays should reach his disiant and innumerable fellow suns, the stars, than that they should illuminate and warm, for a few brief years, the crawling and quarreling inhabitants of a dusty little ball that happens to be circling around him.

"Harrison Fisher Girl" to Return to Broadway

After eight years in which New York has wondered what had become of Maurine Rassmussen, known as "the Harrison Fisher Girl," she has turned up in Los Angeles and has announced she is ready to "go back to the world." Suddenly appearing from out of the West eight years ago, she gave New York a glimpse of a new and striking type of beauty, created a sensation and then dropped from sight as quickly as she had appeared. "It was a case of love," she said, in explaining her long seclusion. She then told how a lingering illness ended several weeks ago in the death of her husband. "Now I am going back to the world and Broadway," she said. "It is my only salvation."

Life's Problems Are Discussed

BY MRS. WILSON WOODROW

I have been asked to explain more in detail an article I wrote which appeared under the caption, "Finding Your Best Talent." The correspondent who makes this request says:

"In having the patience and consideration to answer these questions you will help not only myself but several other struggling souls who have read your article and have talked to me about it.

"First, you say: 'We would not desire whatever our hearts are set upon, if it were not in our power to secure it.' Do you believe that that is a fact?"

Yes; I do believe it. We each have some particular bent or direction in which our minds naturally turn. That is our guidepost; it indicates the desire of our souls. But in many cases it is not heeded. We let events or persons with stronger wills than ours decide for us, or we ar lazy and hate to make the necessary effort. One often hears people in middle life saying, "I should have been an inventor," or, "I should have been a designer," which shows that they've recognized their bent, but for one reason or another didn't follow it. It would take too much application, they thought, to much time, and they were amused or temporarily interested in other things. They would not discipline themselves to the point of holding steadfastly to one idea, and they continued to sell their birthright for a mess of pottage.

My correspondent next asks: "You tell the story of a young woman who achieved her wish to become a greater opera singer; does a mere wish always mean accomplishment?"

Certainly. If the wish is strong enough—a flame that burns steadily and does not have to be relighted again and again. You cannot break an iron bar, but you can cuit it by the application of an acetelyne torch.

In the case of the singer, she had the voice and the desire to be preeminent in her profession, and that desire was so strong that it broke down by its irresistible force all of the innumerable obstacles which threatened to defeat her. Can you imagine an Edison not achieving his destiny?

The third question is: "Please state why in your opinion so many people desire and attempt to do the things for which they are not adapted and therefore never succeed in doing well?

They are not good gardeners. They do not consider the quality of the land that is given them to till. They do not stop to discover the nature and direction of their talents. They are swayed by the whim of the moment, or by the opinion of others, or by the spirit of emulation; or else they follow the line of least resistance.

Most persons want all the good things of life without lifting a finger to get them. They feel aggrieved because their desires are not handed to them on a golden platter. They are not willing to make the sacrifices and go through the drudgery that is the preparatory school to any kind of achievement. The percentage of people who put every ounce of their brains in what they set out to do is almost negligible. There is a great triple combination which can conquer any circumstances—brains, wits and ingenuity.

As an instance, there is the old Greek story of Atalanta. She was the king's daughter and a famous runner, outdistancing all the youths who competed against her, and inevitably winning. It was current gossip that she would marry the runner who could outfoot her in a race, and most of the young men of her day spent their time in training.

But no matter how many entered the lists or how hard they strove to win, she always left them behind taking the dust of her winged feet. So her despairing suitors stood abound, shrugging their shoulders and saying in effect:

"Fat chance we've got. She can leave all of us at the post any time she chooses."

But came one with the firm determination of winning her. He knew that on a question of speed she far outclassed him, but he relied upon his knowledge of feminine psychology.

Consequently during the race when Atalanta had run about half the distance and he was lagging behind, he threw after her a golden apple from the Garden of Hesperides. She knew she had plenty of time, so she stopped to pick it up. He crept nearer, and seeing him she sprinted ahead again.

He threw another apple. He was very near, but she couldn't resist that beautiful globe of solid gold, and she had to swerve out of her course a little to get it, thereby losing distance.

It was almost neck and neck between them, when he threw the third apple. Relying on one of her famous final bursts of speed, she stooped for it, but he shot past her as she did so and touched the goal.

This is a case not unusual of Mediocrity on the job, so to speak, outdistancing Genius so sure of itself that it doesn't bother to take pains.

JAIL IN COLORADO MADE USELESS BY PROHIBITION

Boulder, Colo., How civilization is invading the historic old spots in the wilds of Colorado is illustrated by the recent conversion of a calaboose at Eldora into a cowshed. This calaboose is the same institution that once housed "Two-Gun Charlie" Nicholson and other trigger men of the gold-mining days. No cause for use of the old jail has arisen in the mining camp for so long that one of the citizens leased it for a safe place to shelter his patient cow.

The reason for the jail's declining usefulness may be found, perhaps, in Lacer's Hotel, where the fixtures and great mirror which of old beamed on the patrons of the town's largest saloon, now adorns nothing more harmful than a dining room.

The few old timers who still live in the little mountain town recall the time when "Two-Gun Charlie" drank deep before the same bar and then ran amuck down the main street, declaring that he would kill every Mexican he saw, but shooting at every person, regardless of nationality. Thanks to his liquor, his aim was not the best, and only one man was struck by the bullets. Nicholson was confined in the jail until he was sober and then released with instructions to leave the camp.
