Am I a Crank on Alterations?

I might as well admit it. I am. Everyone agrees in making the accusation, so it is useless to deny it. The other day I mentioned the subject in writing to my advertising man, and at his suggestion I am repeating a couple of sentences from my letter:

Every once in a while when we are short of help in the alteration department and we employ a few new people it is very hard for me to get them to stay simply because they say that we are too particular with our work. They say that this is more like custom tailoring than anything they have ever done.

Well, it may be hard on my tailors, but my clientele seems to appreciate it. And, after all, it's my patrons who pay the tailors. So, I intend to continue to be a crank. I wonder if it isn't the cranks who keep up the world's level of efficiency in all lines?
