ox huckleberry—now known to be in existence.

This I state on the authority of Frederick V. Coville, the botanist, who avers that the least that American naturalists can do for this "charming little thousand-year-old lady of the forest," in return for what she has done for them, is to try to keep her living forever. Her home is on the westward slope of a timbered hill in Perry County, Pennsylvania.

A thousand years seems to be an underestimate of the real age of this horizon-seeking plant, whose pleasure is found not in towering each century a little nearer the sky, like the giant Sequoia, but in hugging close to the
