

MISS CROSMAN IN NEW PLAY

Critical Moment Saved by Talent of Star; Disappointing in Theme

Henrietta Crosman is as charming as ever, but her new place is scarcely worthy of mention, and certainly not worthy of the ever-welcome Miss Crosman. "The Critical Moment," a "triangle" play by Stanley Dark and Eva Dennison, is very disappointing, and even Miss Crosman's wonderful acting could not get it over too well at the Orpheum last evening, when it was played to a handful of people. It will be presented again this evening.

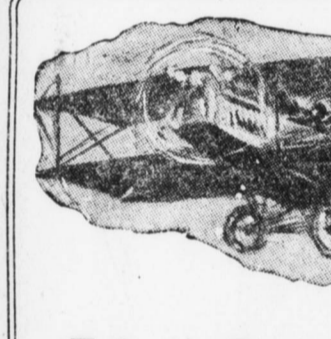

To those who have seen her in her previous success, when she has been surrounded by a more possible cast, and shared the triumphs with such stars as William Faversham and Charles Cherry, as she did in "Swanzy," "Getting Married," the play of last evening was even more than disappointing. Whoever urged it upon Miss Crosman was certainly guilty of a stuporous lack of judgment. As Rhoda Callaghan, the friend who tries to avert the threatened break in the home, and goes so far in her friendship that she jeopardizes her own reputation and future happiness, Miss Crosman was her old self, witty, keen, ever alive to battle, and perpetually seeking to aid her friend. In her supporting cast Harry Burkhardt, as the faithful friend and lover of Rhoda, Edward Barney, as the wrong angle of the triangle, and Edwin Harvey as the girl who is trying to force the break, were quite good. The rest of the cast was also present.
