FIRST "FOREIGNER" TO VISIT SHANTUNG WAS AMERICAN

Andreas Everard Van Braam, Born in Holland, But a Naturalized Citizen of the United States, Made Trip as Dutch Ambassador Through Chinese Province 125 Years Ago.

While interest is keen in the gift to Japan by the League of Nations covenant of Shantung—that immense spit of land that thrusts itself out into the Yellow Sea—it is citizen of the United States and had been living here for some years. His book, compiled at the suggestion of George Washington and dedicated to him, is in the form of a diary and was published for Americans to show them the "golden opportunity" which China offered. The slyness and double dealing of certain Canton mandarins and merchants are denounced as being the one great barrier in the way of international commerce, but it was his belief that England and America must bring China to the fore as a great company and the pomp of their journey, the members of the embassy encountered many discomforts. The intense cold, the poor accommodations, and the carelessness of the coolies all added to their troubles, while upset palangular and joiling Chinese carts jurged the dignity of the Dutch and French gentlemen, and on many or the embassy encountered many discomforts.
