What My Customers Never See My customers see me selling but they never see me buying and after all that's the most vital factor of my business. Some merchants are lazy about buying. They won't take the trouble to shop. They assume that because a certain wholesaler has previously quoted fair prices he always will. I never assume anything in buying. I know too well how prices may vary. I know a grocery shop on Amsterdam Avenue, New York, where a certain standard brand of condensed milk is sold for 14c. I know another shop on Broadway a block distant where the same brand—same size—brings 19c. There's almost as much variation among wholesalers' prices on clothing. When I'm in New York I shop the market thoroughly. I scrutinize each garment closely. I compare values carefully. It is hard work, yes. But it explains why my prices are so low—value considered.
