less extravagance were denounced by Oliver Wilson, national master at the opening session of the fitty-third annual National Grange meeting. Periis that confront the nation were pointed out and a plea was made for new lines of thought and action.

The speaker held that unless the people awakened to the dangers that threatened, more serious catastrophes even to the destruction of the republic might ensue. The demand for shorter hours on the part of certain classes of labor was declared to be indefensible. On the contrary, Mr. Wilson urged more and harder work was the cure for the many of the nation's ills.
