"When a Girl Marries"

By ANN LISLE
A New, Romantic Serial Dealing With the Absorbing Problem of a Girl Wife

CHAPTER CCCLV
(Long before we were through with luncheon, Lane Cosby came lumbering over to our table looking more like a big brown bear than ever.)

"I'm supposed to be the ambassador from my wife," he said, with an effort at social ease. "She seems to think the Willoughbys won't forgive her if they're put off meeting our Princess Anne again. But what really made me more than willing to stumble across the dining room with everyone looking, was that I don't want to wait another minute to meet Anne's father. Not that I mind seeing the Kiddies and Blake, too."

Then in the next minute, when he shook hands with Father Andrew, the awkward society side of Lane's nature sloughed off and his bigness and splendid worth swept up. He and Father Andrew seemed to speak the same language and to understand it almost without words. Because our combined parties would bulk so large, we decided to have out coffee in the lobby, and a few minutes later we met there.

Phoebe had an appointment with Carlotta Sturges and Neal was due at the office, so Carlotta could go gadding with Phoebe, as they explained. So they rushed off. But Shelly, the uninvited, announced that he'd stay to keep old Lane from looking to much like the Sultan of Turkey on a tour of America with a few of his pet wives.

At sight of Shelly the pretty little Willoughbys began to preen and preen for all the world like two saucy birds. And Shelly played up as he always does when attractive women do that. The Willoughby girls were tiny, vivacious, exquisitely dressed and they had a way of fluttering their pretty little hands with an air of helplessness. But their voices were soft and luscious with a slow Southern drawl in vivacious contrast to their quick, pecking movements. They were evidently twins and I fancied they might take a malicious delight in the world's confusion over the way each duplicated the other.

For a minute or two Shelly devoted himself to them, while Lisle and Father Andrew conducted themselves like long lost friends. This left me to Val's tender mercies—and I'd never been less in a mood for Val. With the thought constantly in my mind that disgrace because of something he wasn't responsible for hung over Neal's head, I wasn't in any way prepared to cope with Val's insolence. So I was relieved when she turned from me to Shelly.

"Sheldon—may I claim your complete attention for a moment?" she said in the scornful tones she seems to reserve specially for him.

"Where lies the woman who would have the temerity to dispute claim of yours, or the man with the heart to deny it?" he said in a mock-heroic tone which told me he was taking a leaf out of Val's book and finding a way to stop her from making him the butt of her insolence.

"Val's cream underwent a startled flush, but her voice was never smoother than when she replied:—"Some night," echoed Dana sadly. "That's what they all say."

"But just as I was about to make 'some night' a definite evening Lane rumbled out in great delight:—"Say, Val, is this great or isn't it? Mr. Hyland, here, is on his way to Canada, and Uncle Ned and I've been talking about a trip up that way for weeks. Now I've made a date for the Harrisons to bring Mr. H. up to dinner with us to-night, and I'll have Aunt Mollie and her bridegroom in, too."

"That will be nice. The dinner, I mean," said Val slowly. "And then what?"

"And then Uncle Ned and I plan to start off together in a day or so with Hyland. The two young fellows are going to hit it big time."

"You're going off and—leave me?" asked Val breathlessly.

"Will you be lonesome, honey?" asked Lane, with awkward tenderness. "I'm afraid to be alone," said Val, avoiding my eyes. "But maybe you won't go."

"Uncle Ned's counting on it," replied Lane. "But suppose I said I was counting on your staying with me?" asked Val.

Lane put down his demi-tasse heavily and stared as heavily at our group.

"Am I the lucky man or not?" he asked solemnly. "Look at my beauty girl and then look at her big brown bear, and then stop to calculate that she hates to have me leave her for a day or two. Guess I've made her mine, all right," he added fatuously.

LITTLE TALKS BY BEATRICE FAIRFAX

Who is happier? The woman who does not love her husband, only likes him, but has everything that she wants or the woman who loves her husband and doesn't have the luxuries she was accustomed to before she met him? writes Puzzled.

summer? Or an endless procession of crisp, white, snow-crystallized days? The fun of possessions isn't so much in having them as getting them. The fight for acquisition is more interesting than the mere wrapping them up in tissue paper could ever be.

America Is Best Place to Learn How to Produce—McCurdy

London, Nov. 19.—England needs to produce a great deal more wealth than she did before the war and she can best learn from America how to do it, said C. A. McCurdy, parliamentary secretary to the food controller, in a recent speech dealing with England's industrial and labor troubles.

Machinery and motive power are the tools you give the worker for his business," he continued. "Before the war the American worker was far better equipped in this respect than the British workingman. He had fifty per cent. more motive power, steam power or electrical power to help him in his task.

Austrian Crown Notes Cheaper Than Labels

Vienna, Nov. 19.—A Vienna paper prints a story from Switzerland that a Swiss brewery has adopted the custom of pasting on its bottles, instead of labels, Austrian one-crown notes, which are valued in Switzerland at something less than seven and one-half centimes. The former label of the brewery cost something like ten centimes.

Mental Work Needs a Stomach

Mental work uses up energy fast. And energy comes from food. To eat little or nothing in order to do more work is a fallacy that has created an army of dyspeptics. A better plan is to eat the regular portions of food such as make up the average meal and follow each meal with Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.
