

Lives Lost in Boldly Trying Alaskan Travel

Seward, Alaska. — Reports are beginning to drift in of men losing their lives in various parts of the territory from exposure to the elements. Every year a number of Alaskans freeze or get lost in the blizzards and snowstorms and eventually die from starvation and incidental hardships. Just the other day while John DeLay and Julius Larson were searching for Emil Olsen, who had lost his life, they came upon a man named Irvine who was just at the point of death and unable to help himself. He was taken into Wiseman, and will recover. Old-timers, who are most familiar with the eccentricities of Alaska weather, are almost invariably the victims. In almost every instance where a man is lost through the rigors of the climate he could have been saved by reasonable precautions. Great numbers go forth into the wilds with little food and no adequate provision for sudden severe drops in temperature, and it is amazing the losses are not larger

But many are seen no more until the spring thaws uncover their bodies. A visitor from the United States will wait for days and even weeks before he takes a trail in a blizzard actual or impending; but the old-timer "reck-on" he can make it to such or such a point and frequently sallies forth while temperatures are anywhere from 30 to 50 degrees below zero, or when snow storms are raging of "such intensity he cannot see a stone's throw ahead." This constant flirting with death is difficult to understand, as it is looked upon neither as manly nor courageous, and it is certainly not pure bravado, and certainly it is unnecessary in the vast majority of cases where tragedies result.

Woodchuck Dug Up Coin From a Grave

Watertown, N. Y.—Charles Parsons, veteran Associated Press operator possesses a pocket piece, a penny of the year 1826, which was dug from a grave by a woodchuck. "This penny," Parsons said, "was dug up in the Rodman cemetery by a woodchuck. Sixbury, one of the compositors in the Standard office, was out hunting near Rodman a few weeks ago and chased a woodchuck from a field into the cemetery. The animal dug into a grave and kept throwing a shower of dirt after him. Sixbury could do nothing but watch him. Finally a round black object shot out, and Six picked it up. An inspection showed it to be a coin, but it was black with age. He scrubbed it and found it green; more scrubbing brought out the dark copper color and the date 1826. "How did the coin get into the grave? Well, I can only surmise. In the early days in this section it was the custom to place a coin on the eyelids of a person who had just died in order that the eyes might remain closed when rigor mortis set in. No doubt that was what happened in
