Gen. Mitchell now holds 200 miles of Railroad in Northern Alabama, cutting off West, where they still think they gained the day at Shiloh, and are sending him reinforcements.

Gen. Banks' and Gen. Fremont's Divisions are pressing vigorously towards the Railroad from Virginia to Tennessee, or perhaps "on to Richmond," and if Gen. d'Dowell's division keeps up with their line, they must ere long reach the Rebel Capital-should no reverse occur.

Whatever impatience the President and Secretary of War may have shared with the soldiers and the people when the Army of the Potomas laitered seven months before Manassas, they now cordially approve M'Ciellan's actions at Yorktown. He is an enginier, and as such is reducing the place, we found-not the bags, but that place, as Manassas should have been reduced, by approaches and the strategy of doing something instead of nothing.

Gen. M'Clellen it is supposed now commands 150,000 men, of whom 50,000 are Pennsylvanians.
